PREFACE.

In this volume the history of the Afghán dynasty is completed. The reign of Humáyún is also finished, and the annals of Akbar's reign are carried on to the thirty-eighth year.

The Afghán Táríkhs are of no great literary value, but they are the best authorities for the period of which they treat. The first of them, the Táríkh-i Salátín-i Afághána, has never before been translated; but the other, the Makhzan-i Afghání or Táríkh-i Khán-Jahán Lodí, is the book translated by Dorn in his work entitled "The History of the Afgháns."

Some notices of the first reign of Humáyún are given by the Afghán historians, and his overthrow and expulsion are described by them from the Afghán side of the question in this and the preceding volume. The Humáyún-námá of the veteran historian Khondamír gives some curious accounts of the regulations establied by Humáyún in the early part of his reign. This collowed by a few extracts from the valuable Táríkh-i shídí of Mirzá Haidar, the brave and adventurous rusin of the Emperor Bábar. The work is a general history of the Mughal Kháns, and does not contain much about India; but the Mirzá was a vigorous writer, and what he has recorded of his Indian experience is very vivid and interesting. Some few passages have been extracted from the Memoirs of Humáyún, written by his personal attendant Jauhar, and translated into English by Major Stewart. But the general history of this reign has been drawn from the Tabakát-i Akbarí of Nizámu-d dín Ahmad. Sir H. Elliot's intention has thus been carried out; for he had fixed upon the narrative given in the Táríkh-i Salátín-i Afághana, which proves to have been copied verbatim from the Tabakát.

Sir Henry Elliot had made no provision for the important reign of Akbar, nor did he leave any notes indicating the MSS. he intended to employ. So it has fallen to the Editor to select and translate some history in illustration of this period. The rule of this work has been to prefer original contemporary writers, or, in the absence of actual contemporaries, those nearest in point of time. This rule reduced the choice to two works-the Tabakát-i Akbarí of Nizám Ahmad, and . the Akbar-nama of Abú-l Fazl; for the Muntakhabu-t Tawáríkh of Badáúní is avowedly founded on the Tabakát, and the Akbar-namá of Shaikh Illáhdád Faizí Sirhindí contains very little that has not been borrowed either from the Tabakát or the greater Akbar-náma of Abú-l Fazl. The latter work is of considerable length, and is written in a very ornate style; so the Tabakát seemed best suited to the requirements of this work.

It has accordingly been translated in full, and only such passages as are trivial and irrelevant have been passed over. The reputation of the Tabakát-i Akbarí stands very high in India, and European writers also have joined in its praises. As a contemporary history, it is certainly of very high authority, though it does not exhibit much literary ability. The narrative is often disjointed and fragmentary, but the language is manly and simple, and in striking contrast to the polished phrases of Abú-l Fazl. The Tabakát extends only to the thirty-eighth year of Akbar's reign; the history of the latter end of the reign will be drawn from the works of Abú-l Fazl, Shaikh Illáhdád, and other writers, and will appear in the next volume.

In addition to the Tabakát-i Akbarí, some extracts have been made from the Táríkh-i Alfí, a general history compiled under the direction of the Emperor Akbar, and more copious selections have been taken from the Muntakhabu-t Tawáríkh of 'Abdú-l Kádir Badáúní. The latter writer introduces into his work much original matter; and all that he says about the personal affairs of the Emperor and his religious opinions is of great interest. Extracts from the two Akbar-námas relating to the earlier part of the reign will appear in the next volume; so that although the history of the first thirty-eight years of the reign is comprised in the present volume, it will not be quite complete until those passages are printed. The Aín-i Akbari is the greatest monument of the reign of Akbar, and a new translation by Mr. Blochmann is now in course of publication in the Bibliotheca Indica, enriched with copious notes. That work supplies many of the deficiencies of the historians, and Mr. Blochmann's labours have happily made it quite unnecessary to do more here with the Ain-i Akbari than to refer to his valuable production.

The notes in the Appendix are entirely the work of Sir H. Elliot, and are printed exactly as he left them.

The following is a list of the articles in this volume with the names of the respective writers:—

AHMAD YADGAR.

[Ahmad Yádgár, the author of this work, describes himself in his Preface as an old servant of the Súr kings, and says that Dáúd Sháh gave him orders to write a History of the Afghán Sultáns, and thus do the same for them as the Tabakát-i Násirí and Zíá-i Barní had done for the kings of their times. The book commences with the reign of Bahlol Lodí, and the last chapter narrates the defeat, capture, and execution of Hímú. The author mentions incidentally that his father was wasir to Mirza 'Askarí, when the latter was in command of Humáyún's advanced guard in his campaign in Gujarát; and he also several times names the Tárikh-i Nisāmi and the Ma'danu-l Akhbár-i Ahmadi as the works from which he copied.

The date of the composition of this work has not been ascertained, but as it was written by command of Dáúd Sháh, who died in 984 H., and as it quotes from the Tárikh-i Nizámi (Tabakát-i Akbari), which was written seventeen or eighteen years afterwards in 1001-2 m., the probability is, that it was completed soon after the latter date and before the Makhzan-i Afgháni, which was written in 1020 H. Like the other Afghán historians, Ahmad Yádgár shows a great liking for marvellous and ridiculous stories, but pays little regard to dates. He gives but vory few, and he is incorrect in that of so well-recorded an event as the death of Humáyún. The deficiency of dates may, however, be the fault of the copyist, as blanks are left in the MS. for dates and headings. Sir H. Elliot found the work to "differ much from Ni'amatu-lla," but to "give the idea of being subsequent to the Tárikh-i Dáúdi." Still, though it "generally follows the Tarikh-i Daudi closely," there are occasionally "great differences; details being omitted, and novelties introduced." The history of the reign of Humáyún is copied vorbatim from the Tabakat-i Akbari; only one short variation has been discovered.

The MS. in the Library of the Asiatic Society of Bengal contains 224 pages, of 11 lines to the page.

By far the greater part of the following Extracts were translated by "Ensign" C. F. Mackenzie, but a few, noted where they occur, are from the pen of Sir H. Elliot.]

EXTRACTS.

The siege of Dehli by Mahmud Shah Sharki.1

Mahmud Sharki was instigated to attack Sultan Bahlol by his wife, who was the daughter of Sultan 'Alau-d din. She represented to her husband that the kingdom of Dehli had belonged to her father and grandfather, and who was Bahlol, that he should usurp their dominion? If her husband would not advance, she herself would bind on her quiver, and oppose his pretensions.

Being galled by these taunts, Sultán Mahmúd came to Dehlí in the year 856 H. (1452 A.D.), with a powerful army, and 1000 mountain-like elephants. At that time, Sultán Bahlol was near Sirhind, but Khwája Báyazíd, and Sháh Sikandar Sarwání, and Bibí Matá, the wife of Islám Khán, with all the Afghán families, had taken refuge at Dehlí. There being but few men, Bíbí Matá dressed the women in male clothes, and placed them on the battlements to make a show of numbers. One day, Sháh Sikandar Sarwání was seated on the wall, when one of Sultán Mahmád's water-carriers was taking away somo water from a well under the bastion. Sháh Sikandar drew his bow, and sent an arrow right through the bullock that was earrying the water-bags, and from that time no one dare come near the fort.

But as Sultán Bahlol delayed to relievo the garrison, they began to despair of succour; and as the enemy advanced their redoubts and trenches, and discharged their shells with such precision that no one could venture out of his house, they were reduced to propose terms of surrender, offering to give up the keys of the fort to any of Mahmid's officers, on condition of their being allowed to leave the fort numolested. Accordingly, Saiyid Shamsu-d din took the keys to Daryń Khán Lodi, who had invested the fort, and asked to say a few words to him first in private. When Darvá Khán had sent away his attendants, the Saivid inquired, "What is your relationship to Sultán Mahmid?" Daryá Khán replied, "There is no relationship. I am his servant." The Saiyid then asked, "How are you related to Sultán Bahlol?" Daryá Khán replied, "I am a Lodí, and he also is a Lodi."2 The Saiyid then placed the keys of the fort before him, saying, "Have regard to the honour of your mother and sister (who are now in the fort), and savo the ladies from disgraco." Daryá Khán said, "What can I do? Actuated by fraternal motives, I have intentionally delayed capturing the fort, but Sultán Bahlol delays to make his appearance. For the present do you retain the keys, and wait to see what I shall be able to effect in your behalf."

¹ The Tirikh-i Dáidi says it was cleven palms long, and the distance to which it reached was 800 feet; and that though it penetrated the water-bags as well as the bullock, yet the entire arrow was buried on the other side in the earth.

² The Tirikh-i Diidi is fuller:—"We are brothers: he is a Lodi, and I am a Lodi; his mother is my mother, and his sister is my sister." This explains the allusion to "mother and sister" which occurs below.

Daryá Khán then went to Sultán Mahmúd, and explained to him about the surrender of the keys and their restoration, observing that Bahlol, according to common report, was advancing with a large army, and that it would be better first to pay attention to him; for should he be conquered, Dehlí would of itself fall into their hands. The Sultan inquired what had better be done under the circumstances. Daryá Khán suggested that he and Fath Khán should be despatched against Bahlol, so as to prevent his passing Pánípat. This counsel being approved of, they were sent with 30,000 horse and forty war elephants against Bahlol, who by this time had advanced as far as Narela. Mahmúd's army encamped two kos on the side of Narela, and on the very night of their arrival the enemy twice carried off their bullocks, camels, and horses. Next day, both armies were drawn up in battle array. The army of Bahlol amounted to 14,000 cavalry.

Some time after, Sultán Bahlol marched out against the Ráná, and pitched his camp at Ajmír, where he collected a powerful force.² Chattar Sál, son of the Ráná's sister, was at U'dípúr with 10,000 cavalry. Kutb Khán advanced towards that place, and fought an action with the rascally infidel. At first, the Sultán's army was repulsed by the impetuous onset of the infidels, and several Afglians obtained martyrdom in that contest; but, in the end, Kutb Khan and Khan-khanan Farmuli, determining to sell their lives dearly, advanced to close combat with swords and daggers, and so completely routed their black-faced foes, that Chattar Sal was slain in the field; and so many infidels fell, that a pillar was raised of their heads, and streams of their blood began to flow. Five or six elephants, forty horses, and much plunder fell into the hands of the Sultan's soldiers, while those of the Rana took to flight. Subsequently, the Rana made peace, and in U'dipur prayers were offered and the coin was struck in the name of the Sultan.

^{1 [}Translated by Sir H. Elliot.]

² This transaction is not mentioned by any other historian, nor do we find it in the Rujput Annals. One engagement between the Imperialists and Mewaris is recorded in the time of Rui Mal, who ascended the gaddi in A.D. 1474, but the particulars differ in every respect. We are also told in general terms, that Mewar had to contest her northern boundary with the dynasty of Lodi.—Tod, Annals of Rajasthan, vol. i., p. 292.

After that, the Sultán carried his victorious army into Múnkhár.¹ He plundered and depopulated that entire country, and the army acquired great booty. Thence he returned to Sirhind, and after two or three months, advanced with his troops towards Lahore, where he passed some days in festivities.

At that time, Ahmad Khán Bhattí,² who had acquired great power in the country of Sind, and had 20,000 cavalry under him, had revolted against the Governor of Multán; whose petition arrived, representing that Ahmad Khán was plundering the villages of Multán, and that if the Lord of the World would not come to the rescue, he himself would not be able to hold his own in Multán; and that after the loss of Multán, the Panjáb would be exposed to ravage. The Sultán, vexed at this intelligence, appointed 'Umar Khán, one of his chief nobles, and Prince Báyazíd, to command an expedition against Ahmad Khán, at the head of 30,000 valiant horsemen. After taking leave of the Sultán in all honour, they moved by continued marches from Lahore till they reached Multán, where they were joined by the Governor, who acted as their guide till they reached the enemy's country.

Ahmad Khan, proud in the strength and courage of his

One of the anecdotes related by this author mentions the entire destruction of Munkhar, and the deportation of its inhabitants. The Tdrikh-i Ddudi gives the same facts, but speaks only of "a village in the pargana of Munkhar."—MS., p. 34.

army, disregarded the Imperialists, and, not thinking it worth his while to move, sent his nephew, at the head of 15,000 cavalry, to oppose them. That youth was desperately enamoured of a strumpet, who was indeed surpassingly beautiful, and he never moved out on any excursion of pleasure or hunting without being accompanied by her; and, even on the day of battle, he seated her in an 'amari, mounted on an elephant, and carried her with him. Naurang Khán, for that was his name, detached Dáúd Khán with 10,000 cavalry against the Imperialists, and the two parties charged each other with such impetuosity that rivers of blood began to flow. In the end, Dáúd Khán was slain, and his troops defeated. When those who had fled from the field informed Naurang Khán of the disaster, he took leave in sorrow of his mistress, and arrived on the field of battle, where he displayed such valour and desperation that he clove several men of the Sultán's army in twain, and felled them from their horses. At last, a ball from a camel-gun cut him also in half, and killed him.

When the news of Naurang Khan's fate reached his mistress, she, being endowed with a masculine mind, put on a suit of armour, bound round her waist a gilt quiver, and placing a helmet on her head, joined the army of Naurang Khán. Upon consultation with his brother, she recommended that he should send all the troops to pay their respects to her, and should give out that the prince, the son of Ahmad Khán, had arrived, in order that the enemy might be distracted, and not entertain the persuasion that they had really killed the commander of their enemy's troops. Accordingly, all the cavalry dismounted, and made their obeisances, while the kettle-drums resounded with loud notes of joy. The Imperialists, notwithstanding their victory, were perplexed, and in the midst of their doubts, were suddenly attacked so furiously by Ahmad Khán's army, that they were put to flight. Ahmad Khán, when he heard of the victory of his army and the salutary aid afforded by that woman, was astounded with joy; and when he saw her arrive, decked in martial array, he praised her valour and conduct, and bestowed jewels upon her to the value of 10,000 rupees.

On the other hand, Prince Báyazíd, after punishing the men who fled from the field of battle, sent for another army, and two or three great nobles were despatched to his assistance with large reinforcements. When these had all joined, they made an inroad upon Ahmad Khán's territory, and he, after many battles, was at last taken prisoner and put to death, while his country was sequestered and included in the Imperial domain. Báyazíd returned victorious to the court of Sultán Bahlol, by whom he was received with royal benignity.

The reign of Sultan Ibráhim Lodi.

Some historians relate that when Sikandar died, he left two sons by one wife: the first, Sultán Ibráhím; tho second, Jalál Khán. When Ibráhím grew up, and became celebrated for his personal beauty and excellent disposition, the nobles determined to place him on the throne, to which they accordingly raised him on Thursday, the 7th of Zi-l hijja, A.H. 923 1 (Nov. 1517). On that day, all those who were attached to the royal person prepared the tents, embroidered with gold and adorned with jewels, and spread carpets of various colours, worked with gold thread. They placed the throne of Sikandar, covered with gems of price and jewels of great value, on a coloured carpet. The tributary kings and nobles woro beautiful dresses and embroidered garments, and resembled the flowers blooming in a garden. The horses and elephants were decked with the most magnificent trappings. So splendid a coronation had never been witnessed, and the people consequently long remembered the day on which this fortunate and youthful monarch obtained the erown.

The nobles and pillars of the State then gave Ibráhím's

brother by the same mother, the title of Sultán Jalálu-d dín (he had been previously called Jalál Khán), and sent him with many officers and a large army to take charge of the kingdom of Jaunpúr. Four months afterwards, 'Azam Humáyún Lodí' and the Khán-khánán Farmulí came from their estates to congratulate the King, and took that opportunity of accusing the nobles attending on His Majesty, saying, that it was a great error for two persons to share a kingdom, and that two sovereigns could never rule together. As the poet says:

"One body cannot cover two souls,

Nor one kingdom own two monarchs."

Accordingly, Sultán Ibráhím cast the agreement which he had made with his brother into the recess of oblivion; and after taking advice, came to the conclusion that as the Sháhzáda was not thoroughly established, and had not as yet arrived at the seat of his government, it would be best to write and tell him that the Sultán required his presence to aid him in transacting certain momentous affairs; that he should come unattended; and that after they had consulted together, he might return to the seat of his government.²

Haibat Khán, the wolf-slayer, who was noted for his extreme cunning, was despatched on this errand, and directed to cajole the Sháhzáda to return with him. It is said, that walls have cars, and an account of this arrangement had, before this, come to the ears of Jalálu-d dín, so that he was not entrapped by the flattering speeches and attempts at deception which Haibat Khán used profusely, and therefore he would not consent to come.

² The Twirikh-i Khdn-Jahdn adds, that the nobles were determined to keep up this agitation for their own sakes, "as they never considered it convenient that public affairs should be under the restraint of one absolute monarch."

Haibat Khán reported his unsuccessful mission, and the King then sent divers other courtiers; these were also unsuccessful, as the Sháhzáda steadily refused to go with them. After this, the Sultán wrote farmáns containing expressions of kindness and goodwill to all the nobles and jágírdárs of the súba of Jaunpúr, and promised them munificent rewards if they would forsake their allegiance to Jalál Khán, and refuse to treat him as their ruler. He sent secretly a confidential servant to certain of the nobles, bearing dresses of honour, horses, etc., and commanded them, on the receipt of this farmán, to renounce allegiance to Jalál Khán.

As it was decreed by fate, that Jalálu-d dín should not reign, many of the grandees deserted him, and became his enemies. At this period Sháhzáda Jalál Khán, having set up a jewelled throne, and covered the doors and walls of his palace with brocade, sat there in state on the 15th of Zí-l hijja, 923 A.H. (Dec. 1517). He gave audience to the servants of the State, the courtiers and the soldiers, to all of whom he presented dresses of honour, swords,

1 These circumstances will be found differently related by Firishta. See Briggs, vol. i., p. 590. Sikandar Lodí dying at Agra, his son Ibráhím succeeded to the throne. At a very early period, contrary to the custom of his father and grandfather, he made no distinction among his officers, whether of his own tribe or otherwise, and said publicly, that kings should have no relations or clansmen, but that all should be considered as subjects and servants of the State; and the Aighan chiefs, who had hitherto been allowed to sit in the presence, were constrained to stand in front of the throne, with their hands crossed before them. Shortly after his accession a conspiracy was formed by the Lodi chiefs, by whom it was agreed to leave Ibrahim in quiet possession of Dehli and a few dependent provinces, and to raise the Prince Jalal Khan, his brother, to the throne at Jaunpur. The Prince accordingly, marching from Kalpi in conjunction with the disaffected chiefs asserted the throne of Jaunpur. He appointed his cousin, Fath Khan, his waris, who gained over all the officers of the eastern provinces to his interest. King Jail Lohani was at this time proceeding from Rapri to congratulate Ibrahim and sometime, filing in with the disaffected nobles, he blamed them several for couring divisions in the kingdom, which, he said, would be attended with feel consequents to the feeling of Lodi. girdles, daggers, horses, elophants, titles, and honours, according to their respective ranks. Having thus gained the good opinion of the people, he opened the gates of charity to the poor and needy, and increased their allowances; and having thus established his authority, he ceased to obey Sultán Ibráhím, and caused the khutba to be read and coin to be struck in his own name. When he felt himself sufficiently powerful, he sent confidential agents to 'Azam Humáyún, who was at that time besieging the fort of Kálinjar,1 and wrote to him, saying, "You are in the place of my father and uncle, and are well aware that the compact has not been broken by me. Sultán Ibráhím, of his own accord, gave me a portion of the inheritance which our father left, because I was his own brother, the son of the same mother. He has broken the phial of the connexion which we derived from our parent's womb with the stone of unkindness. You ought to protect and help me because I am oppressed." Previous to this 'Azam Humáyún had been ill-disposed towards Sultán Ibráhím. He was moved by the supplications of Jalál Khán, and raised the siege of the fort. He entered into a treaty and compact with Jalálu-d dín, and told him that he ought first to obtain possession of Jaunpur, and then see what was best to be done. He then advanced towards Oudh by an uninterrupted succession of marches. The governor of that place, finding himself unable to contend with him, fled towards Karra, and sent information of what was passing to Sultán Ibráhím, who wished to start immediately with some picked men for the purpose of repressing the disturbance. By the advice of certain of the nobles, he confined four of his brothers in the fort of Hánsí, and entrusted them to the charge of Muhammad Khán with 500 horse. He, moreover, summoned all the nobles into his private apartment, and gained them to his side by making them presents in gold, and giving them titles and dignities; after which he ordered the bakhshis to issue arrears of pay to the army, and give them one month's gratuity.

On Thursday, the 24th of Zí-l hijja, he proceeded in the direction of Jaunpur by uninterrupted marches, and on arrival at Bhúigánw received intelligence that 'Azam Humáyún and his son Fath Khán had forsaken Sultán Jalálu-d dín, and were on their way to pay their respects. The Sultan was delighted at this news, and caused his army to halt, in order that ho might make due preparations for their reception. On the day fixed for 'Azam Humáyún's coming, Ibráhím sent a large concourse of his principal chieftains to meet him; and when he made his obeisance, his head was exalted by the many marks which he received of the royal favour. The Sultan also presented khil'ats of cloth of gold, girdles, jewelled daggers, and somo of his most valuable elephants to 'Azam Humáyún, whom ho rendered grateful by these attentions. Meanwhile be appointed some of the principal nobles to conduct the war against Jalálu-d dín, and furnished them with a large army, war elephants, and all other needful equipments. Jalálu-d dín had marched towards Agra with a large army, consisting of 30,000 horsemen, besides many elephants; leaving some of his partisans in Kálpí, to which place Sultán Ibráhím laid siege, and took it after a short resistance, and gave it over to plunder.1 After this, when he heard that his brother had gone towards Agra with a strong force, he sent Malik Adam Ghakkar² to protect that place, which he accordingly reached with all expedition. Jalálu-d dín wished to treat Agra as the Sultán had done Kálpí; but Malik Adam contrived to deceive and amuse him until he had sent for further assistance, and given Sultán Ibráhím notice of what was passing. The Sultán despatched 18,000 horsemen and 50 elephants to the assistance of the Malik, whose heart was so strengthened that he sent to Jalálu-d dín, to say, that if he would relinquish all claim to the empire, and would put aside the umbrella, the áftábgír, the naubat, the kettle-drum, and other insignia of royalty, and would promise to conduct himself as one of the umará, he (Malik Adam) would use his interest in his behalf, and would obtain for him the súba of Kálpí on the same terms as he formerly held it.

Sultán Jalálu-d dín, led by his evil destiny, which had unfitted him for the charge of a kingdom, although he possessed 30,000 brave horsemen and 160 war elephants, acted like a coward, and agreed to these conditions. All his chiefs said to him, "Why are you so weak-hearted? The Sultán will on no account suffer you to live. We have eaten your salt for ten years; be firm and resolute, and give your faithful servants an opportunity of showing their devotedness to you. God is the Supreme Disposer of all things. The Sultan is of a bad disposition. the nobles and troops will side with you." Notwithstanding their advice, as Providence had decreed his ruin, Jalálu-d dín was satisfied with the terms, and left off using the insignia of royalty. He sent Malik Adam Ghakkar to the King, to beg him to grant him other jágírs; but the Sultán (who was then at Etáwa) would not agree to do so, and sought means to get rid of him. When Jalálu-d dín heard of his intentions, he took refuge with the Rájá of Gwálior, and his old soldiers dispersed. Sultán Ibráhím took up his abode at Agra, and many nobles who had been hostile to him came and tendered their submission. Karimdád Khán Tágh, with others of the umará, were sent to take charge of Dehli. Meanwhile, the army of the Sultán besieged Gwálior, and 'Azam Humáyún was sent to take the command. Sultán Jalálu-d dín accordingly left that place, and retired to Málwá; where, not being well received by the Sultán Mahmúd, he fled to Garra-Kantak, where he fell into the hands of the Gonds, who seized him, and with a view to gain the good-will of the Sultan, sent their captive to him. The Sultan rejoiced at this intelligence, and caused all his . court to assemble. Sultán Jalálu-d dín was brought hand-bound into this assembly, after which he was sent to the fort of Hánsí. Whilst he was en route to that place, Ahmad Khán was sent after him, and administered the draught of martyrdom.

After these events, the Sultan ruled the country without fear, and without admitting a partner to share his empire. The Raja of Gwalier, who had been his enemy for years, having departed to the infernal regions, was succeeded by his son, Bikramajít. The Sultan, after a long war, wrested the fort from him; and taking down the copper bull, out of whose mouth a voice issued, from its place over the gate, brought it to the fort of Agra, where it remained until the time of the Emperor Akbar, who caused it to be melted down for the purpose of making cannon.

When the Sultan had conquered Gwalier, he went to Dehli, and waxed very proud, so that he began to maltreat and punish the nobles of his father, many of whom held him in great awe. He imprisoned some of them, and throwing Mián Bhúa into chains, who had been the most powerful and independent grandee lock at him, and struck him in the forehead, when he fell to the earth. This caused the rebels to disperse, and the King's army, taking advantage of the panic, attacked them. Thus the only reward which Islâm Khân met with for his rebellion and ingratitude was death, while Sa'id Khân and others were made prisoners. The rebel forces were utterly routed, and the insurrection suppressed. When the King learnt this, he was much pleased, and behaved towards the army, which had fought so well and loyally for him, with the greatest kindness; but he did not forget the malice of the nobles.

² All the other authorities represent that it was a brazen bull, and though they pronounce it to have been worshipped by the Hindús, mention nothing about the voice. They say also that it was transferred to the Baghdád gate of Dehlí, where Nizámu-d dín Ahmad tells us he himself saw it in Akbar's time. 'Abdu-l Kádir, however, says that it was removed from Dehlí to Fathpúr, where he saw it.—See Extracts from the Tárikh-i Baddúni. We can perhaps reconcile this by the Tárikh-i Khán-Jahán Lodi, whose author (MS., p. 144) says he saw it at Dehlí before 999, when it was melted down for bell-metal. It was taken from an outwork of Gwálier, constructed by Rájá Mán, called Bádalgarh, which exists to the present day under the same name. According to the Tárikh-i Dáúdí (MS., p. 150), Bádalgarh was captured by the application of gunpowder, similar to the mode in which we took Ghazní.

At this period an army was prepared for the purpose of attacking Ráná Sanká.1 Mián Husain Khán Zarbakhsh, Mián Khán-khánán Farmulí, and Míán Ma'rúf,2 who were the chief commanders in the army of Sultan Sikandar, and whom he had distinguished beyond all others by associating with them, and increasing their rank and preferments,-who were the bravest men of the age, and could have instructed even Rustam in the art of war,-and who during the reign of the deceased Sultan had fought many battles and taken many castles;—these generals tho Sultán placed under Mián Mákhan, the commander-in-chief of this expedition.3 When they arrived in the Ráná's country, the Sultán wrote, ordering Míán Mákhan to seize Míán Husain Khán and Mián Ma'rúf Khán in the best way he could, and send them prisoners to him. Makhan Khan went to the tent of Ma'ruf Khan, under the pretence of condoling with him for the loss of his son, notwithstanding he had died two months previously. Mián Husain Khán was informed of this, and went speedily thither, and told Mián Mákhan that he had better forego his intention of imprisoning Mián Maruf, and that he had better rise and depart in safety, remarking that the King had gone mad. Makhan upon this remonstrance departed, and sent intelligence of the circumstances to the Sultún, who replied by inquiring why he went to people's tents, and ordering him to raise a large tent in the plain, and send information to the chiefs that a royal farmin had arrived, and that they must come and hear its contents. Minn Mukhan was commanded to seize Husain Khan first, and he obeyed these orders. When the chiefs were assembled, Minn Husain came, bringing with him a thousand men clothed in chain armour, which was concealed by white clothing. He directed them to keep strict watch outside when he entered the tent. Mian Makhan had caused another tent to be creeted near the first, in which he had placed a thousand soldiers, with orders, when Ma'rúf Khán approached, to lay hands first on Husain Khin. When Husain Khin arrived near the tent, he was told that soldiers were concealed in it for the purpose of seizing him and Ma'rúf Khán. When Mián Husain Khán reached it, he ordered his men to undo the ropes of the tent in which Mian Makhan's soldiers were placed in ambush, and consequently the tent fell on them.1 He then went into the other tent, and requested Mián Mákhan to read the farman. Mian Makhan said, "It is contrary to orders to read it after this fashion." Mián Musain Khán replied, "I am fully aware that the object of these troops and this farman is to take away my life, and I am not going to yield it to any such worthless contrivance." He then took the horsomen, and the Rana sent his own nephew to meet him. After which they had an interview.

A few particulars will be found respecting this officer in an extract from the Wdkidt-i Mushtaki, showing him to be a sauctimonious and obstinate old Pharisee. (See Vol. IV., p. 548.)

³ The Tarikh-i Daudi represents that this was of itself subjecting them to great indignity.

On account of the departure of Husain Khan, Mian Makhan, netwithstanding that he had with him 30,000 horsemen and 300 gigantic elophants, was much discouraged. The day after he put his army in battle array, for the purpose of attacking the The Rana, together with Mian Husain Khan, advanced against him with an innumerable army, and the elephants of Husain Khan woro recognized amongst them. Mian Makhan sent a messago to Mian Marnif, saying, "You and Husain Khan are great friends. He is now in rebellion, and has joined the Sultan's enomics; what is the good of your remaining with Ma'ruf roplied, "I have eaten the salt of Sultan Bahlel and his offspring for thirty years; and I was chief commander of the army during the reign of Sultan Sikandar. The fort of Jund was captured through my skill. I slow the Raja of Nagarkot; and that stone, which the Hindús had worshipped for 3000 years, I exposed to be trodden under foot by all the From the period of the revelation of Islam to the prosont day, many noble monarchs, who fancied that they resombled Faridan and Sikandar, and who vanquished the world, were muchle even so much as to besiege that fort; yet it yielded I brought seven mans of gold from the Raja to my prowess. of Bihar. Since King Ibrahim's accession to the throne all sorts of upstarts have arison, who accuse me of being faithloss and rebollions. Even now I am ready to undertake any duty that may be assigned, and will not flinch from its porformanoo."

Whilst this was going on, information was brought of the arrival of the Ráná's troops, whoroupen Mákhan arranged his army. Ho placed Sa'íd Khán Furat and Hájí Khán with 7000 horsemen on the right; and Daulat Khán, Alláh-dád Khán, and Yúsnf Khán on the loft; whilst Míán Mákhan himself commanded the advance. Míán Husain, although much voxed with Míán Mákhan, did not present himself, on account of his having eaten the salt of the Sultán.1 When both parties were prepared for action, the Hindús advanced most valiantly, and succeeded in defeating the army of the Sultan. Many brave and worthy men were made martyrs, and the others were scattered; whilst Míán Mákhan returned to the place from which he had set forth. During the evening, Mián Husain Khán sent a message to Mián Mákhan, saying, "Now you have learnt what men of one heart are. It is a hundred pities that 30,000 horsemen should have been defeated by so few Hindús. Now you may learn what deeds the remembrance of past favours will induce vassals to perform when they are united heart and soul. Send Mián Ma'rúf duly prepared for action to me at midnight." He also wrote to Mián Ma'rúf, to tell him that "they had both seen how fit Mián Mákhan was to command, and that now it was proper that they should recollect what they owed the Sultán, although he did not treat his good servants as he ought; otherwise people would say, 'You ate the salt of Sultán Sikandar for thirty years, and were numbered amongst his chiefs, nevertheless you were ungrateful enough to side with his foes.""

Accordingly Míán Ma'rúf, accompanied by 6000 horsemen, left his camp, and halted at the distance of two kos from Míán Husain, which chief, on receiving intelligence of his arrival, came and joined him. The army of the Ráná, flushed with their success, were rejoicing and amusing themselves, and the angel of death was smiling at their heedlessness, when suddenly the sound of horns and kettle-drums withdrew the cotton from the ears of their senses, and the Rájpút chieftains were dismayed. The Afgháns rushed on them sword in hand, and commenced a promiscuous slaughter; the Ráná was wounded, but contrived to escape with some of his men,—the rest were put to the sword. In the morning this news was brought to Míán Mákhan, and he was ashamed.

Mián Báyazíd, the son of 'Atá Lodi, who was the bakhshi of the army, and a counexiou of Mián Husain Khán, wrote to the King announcing the victory which Mián Husain Khán and Mián Ma'ráf had gained, after which Mián Husain Khán sent fifteen of the elephants and 300 of the horses of the Ráná to Dehlí. The Sultán was much pleased at this success; he caused the kettle-drams to be beaten loudly, and sent khil'ats, girdles, daggers, two valuable elephants, and four horses, to Mián Husain and Mián Ma'ráf. He also caused a farmán to be written, in which he leaded both of them with a hundred expressions of favour and good-will.\(^1\)

About this time 'Azam Humáyím, one of the chief nebles, who, together with his sons, held a mansab of 12,000, was sont to reduce the fort of Gwalier. When he reached that district, his skill and activity soon made him master of several parganas. He besieged the fort of Gwálior, and dug trouches in which he sheltored his men whilst he made his approaches, and distributed the several batteries amongst his officers. He projected fiery missiles, or shells, into the fort, and the Mindús filled bags with cotton steeped in oil, which they ignited and threw down upon the onemy. Many men were consumed on both sides. The Sultau's troops brought forward their artillery, and fired thoir balls with such effect that the defenders of the fort were unable to move to and fro in its interior, and were at last so much distressed that they were near surroudering. had already determined to soud soven mans of gold, several pair of elephants, and his daughter to the Sultan, whon, moxpec-

As the other historians say not a word of the expedition against the Rana, we learn nothing from them of the boasted perfldy of the homoured scoundrel Husain Khan; and in the Waki'at-i Mushtaki and the Turkh-i Duhal there is quite a different conclusion of this affair, comprised in a rambling unconnected statement, which is not worth translation or abstract. Sufflee it to say that, according to both these works, he was, in the end, murdered at Chanderi by order of this vindictive Sulfan, who rewarded the assassin with 700 gold pieces, and ton villages in in'alm, which is calculated to give us a high idea of the origin of rent-free holdings. All the authorities agree in the statement of the murder, and of the disgust and alarm it inspired.

tedly, a farmán arrived, ordering 'Azam Humáyún as soon as lie received it to proceed to Court.

When 'Azam Humáyún lcarned its contents, he raised the siege and prepared to depart. His sons and friends expressed to him their suspicions that the Sultán intended to take away his life, as he had already done that of other noblemen; and several grandees who were attached to him also advised him not to go. 'Azam Humáyún replied that he had eaten the salt of that family for forty years, and had been one of their stannchest adherents, and that if he now forsook them he would be considered ungrateful, and he could not suffer the disgrace of that imputation. Mahmúd Khán Lodí and Dáúd Khán Sarwání, who were among the chief grandees, said, "The Sultán has lost his senses, he cannot distinguish between those who serve him well and those who serve him ill. You have now 30,000 horse with you. Go to your son's residence, and take measures for the protection of your life, because we are fully convinced that he has sent for you for the purpose of treating you as he did Mián Bhúa and Hájí Khán." 'Azam Humáyún replied, "I cannot act thus. I cannot turn aside and blacken my face, let what may happen."

After this discussion he marched towards Dehlí. On the road news reached him that the Sultán had put to death Mahmúd Sarpání and Hishám Khán Sáhú-khail, two of the principal nobles. Dáúd Khán and Alláh-dád Khán said, "No evil has yet befallen you; return from this and go to your son at Jaunpúr." 'Azam Humáyún said, "You speak truth; his actions are indeed bad: but I cannot act as you suggest."

As 'Azam Humáyún's doom was sealed, he did not pay attention to the warnings of his friends and well-wishers, but continued his march to Dehlí. When he approached it, the Sultán's order arrived, directing him to give up all his horses and elephants. This he had no sooner done, than his whole army became disorganized. When he was within two kos of the city, the King's cup-bearer, by name Mukhlis, was sent for the purpose of depriving him of the command of the army, treasury, and their appurtenances. Mukhlis was likewise ordered to mount him on a small pony, and bring him into the city, and cast him into a dungeon; all of which he did, and deprived him of everything. 'Azam Humáyún sent to the Sultán to say, "You of course will do what pleases you, but I have two things of importance to represent to you: the first is that my son 1 is very turbulently disposed, and that measures should be taken speedily to repress him; the second, that I may not be prevented from obtaining water for my ablutions, and the necessaries for purifying myself after performing the offices of nature." After this he made no further petition, and at last the Sultan caused this single-minded man to be slain in his prison, and thus destroyed the root of his empire with his own hands. The murder of 'Azam Ilmayun was the first cause of the decline of the kingdom,3 for Fath Khán, his son, who commanded 10,000 horse, and was Governor of Bihar, joined himself, in Bihar, with the son of Darya Khan Lohání, Sháhbáz Khán by name. They then openly rebelled against the Sultán, and collected 70,000 horse. Sháhbáz Khán 4 assumed the title of Sultan Muhammad. This insurrection was of a very sorious naturo, as all Bihar ceased to obey the Sultan.

At this poriod, Daulat Khán Lodí, son of Tátár Khán, who

had long governed the Panjáb, was sent for from Lahore. He delayed to come, and sent his youngest son, Diláwar Khún, instead. The latter was asked why his father had not come in person. He replied that he would come hereafter and bring treasure with him. He was told that if his father did not come. he would be seized like the other nobles. The Sultan then ordered him to be taken to the dungeons, in order that he might see several nobles who were suspended from the walls. When Diláwar Khán witnessed this sight, he was seized with a fit of trembling, and was much alarmed. On his return to the presence, the Sultan said, "You have seen the condition of those who have disobeyed me." Diláwar Khán prostrated himself. It is said that the Sultan intended to blind him with a red-hot bodkin, and suspend him also against the wall; but when Diláwar Khán perceived that there was no other means of escaping the Sultán's severity, he fled from Dehlí, and came to his father in six days, and told him-that if he did not look to himself, the Sultan would put him to death in some cruel manner.

Danlat Khán was thrown into a deep meditation. He reflected that if he rebelled he would be accused of ingratitude; and that if he fell into the clutches of the Sultán's wrath, he would not escape alive. At last he determined to place himself under allegiance to some other sovereign. He accordingly sent Diláwar Khán to Bábar Sháh, in order that he might make known to him, in detail, the evil disposition of the Sultán, the discord which existed amongst the nobles, and the disgust of the army, and beg him to invade Hindústán.

Diláwar Khán went with all expedition, and reached Kábul in ten days. He intimated to those who stood at the foot of the throne that an Afghán, who had been oppressed by his sovereign, had come from Hindústán, and wished to speak to the King. The order was given for his admission. He went as a supplicant, and explained, in detail, the distressed state of Hindústán.

Bábar said, "You have eaten the salt of Sultán Ibráhím and of his father and grandfather for thirty years, and your grandfather and father have held high posts for the last twenty years; how is it that you have thus all at once forsaken him and sought this court?" Diláwar Khán replied, "For forty years my grandfather and father have risked their lives in his service, and strengthened his throne. But Sultán Ibráhím maltreats his father's nobles, and has put twenty-three of them, the supporters of his kingdom, to death, without any cause, and ruined their families. He has suspended some from walls, and has caused others to be burned alive. When many of the nobles saw that they could hope for no safety from him, they sent me to your presence. They are all ready to obey you, and they look with anxiety for your coming."

At that period the marriage of Mírzá Kámrán was celebrated with princely magnificence in the King's garden. * * * When the bridal ceremonies had been completed in a manner satisfactory to his benevolent intentions, the King passed the whole of that night in the garden. When day dawned, he repeated his prayers to the Great Disposer of all things, and stretching forth the hand of supplication, said, "O God! if the government of Hindústán is destined to be given to me and mine, let these productions of Hind be brought presently before me, betel-leaves and mangoes, and I shall accept them as an omen."

It so happened that when the mango season was approaching, Daulat Khán had sent half-ripe mangoes preserved in pots of honey, and betel-leaves, by the hand of Ahmad Khán. The King was told that Ahmad Khán, the ambassador of Daulat Khán, desired an audience. Diláwar took the offerings into the royal presence, and displayed them. When Bábar's eyes fell on the fruit, he arose from his throne, and prostrated himself before the Almighty, who, he was persuaded, of His boundless generosity, had granted him the sovereignty of Hind. He gave a horse and khil'at to both Diláwar Khán and Ahmad Khán, and entrusted to them ten 'Irákí horses, and some pieces of fine linen for

Daulat Khán; and then directed Ahmad Khán to precede him with these articles.¹

From that day he prepared for the invasion of Hindústán, and despatched Jahángír Kúlí Khán, with 2000 Mughal horsemen, to take precautions for securing the roads and ferries, and for the collection of timber for the purpose of making boats.

On Wednesday, 2nd Shawwal, A.H. 932 (July, 1526 A.D.), he set forth as a mighty monarch should, and marched to Peshawar, which city he plundered. When the royal army advanced from thence, Daulat Khan came to pay his respects to the King, and presented 10,000 gold ashrafis and twenty elephants. When Babar left Kabul, he had only 2000 Mughals with him.² But after his agreement with Daulat Khan, he ordered fresh troops to be enlisted; and by the time he reached Lahore he was surrounded by a numerous army, and the Panjab fell into the hands of the Chaghatai nobles.

When news reached Sultán Ibráhím, in A'gra, that the Mughals had conquered the Panjáb as far as Lahore, he was thunderstruck, and repented him of having put his faithful servants to death. But what benefit can be derived from water which has fallen down from the head and been spent? Bábar, like a roaring lion, advanced into the field; while Ibráhím came to Dehlí from A'gra, and wrote to Daulat Khán, saying, "You attained your present rank through my father's kindness; why have you brought the Mughals into my paternal inheritance, and made it over to them? I will now make peace with you, and will never molest you or your children. I swear this on the Kurán. Reflect, and abandon your present absurd project." Daulat Khán replied, "It is true that I was reared and raised from the dust, and brought up by Sultán Sikandar. I passed my life in endeavouring to serve him. That monarch (who has found mercy) endured much from his nobles; he was studious of pleasing: and he never endeavoured to put me to death. Whereas, whilst you were yet young, you listened to what two or three insidious advisers said to you, and thus shook your empire to its foundation. You also destroyed several of your father's servants, the pillars of the kingdom, and put an end to the confidence which others reposed in you. I have not brought the Mughals; but your own bad actions have."

When the whole Panjáb, and the country extending as far as Sirhind and Hisár Fírozah, had fallen into the hands of the Chaghatái nobles, they marched towards Dehlí.

Sultan Ibrahim was in Sonpath, when news arrived that certain grandees, thinking the opportunity a good one, and having heard of the coming of Babar Shah, had besieged Dehli with nearly 40,000 men. On hearing this, the Sultan again turned his steps towards Dehli, to defeat the rebels, who came to the conclusion that it would be improper to fight with the Sultan during the day, because they would be put to shame on account of the benefits which he had conferred on them; and that it would be preferable to attack him by night.

When the night was far spent, they reached the Sultán's army, and in the mean time several chiefs managed to escape from the Sultán's camp and join them. After putting the Sultán's troops to flight, and compelling the Sultán to coneeal himself, a portion of the rebel force was scattered tumultuously in search of plunder. After sunrise, when the Sultán looked out in the direction of the rebel army, on observing 'Alam Khán' and a few atten-

This is ascribing to these slippery and perjured knaves finer feelings than they were capable of entertaining. Bábar gives a much more probable reason for the selection of the night:—"The confederates concurred in opinion that if the battle was fought in the daytime, the Afghans, from regard to their reputation with their countrymen, would not flee; but that if the attack was made by night each chief would shift for himself."—Memoirs, p. 295. We have another amusing instance of this facial modesty and timidity ascribed to the townsmen of Agra, at the beginning of Islam Shah's reign.

² This was the Sultan's uncle, who had been proclaimed King under the title of dants standing near, he ordered his men to attack them; upon which they all fled away. Thus the rebels derived no benefit from their disloyalty, in spite of their having assembled a force of 40,000 men.

After this, when Bábar heard of the confusion prevailing in the Sultán's army, he left Karnál, and Sultán Ibráhím arrived in pargana Ganaur, and there inquired of the astrologers in order that he might learn from the celestial bodies what was to happen. He inquired on whose side the victory should be. The astrologers cautiously replied, "It appears from the motion of the stars that the whole of our horses and elephants have gone over to the Mughal army." The Sultán said, "This is a proof that I shall vanquish the Mughals." They replied, "So let it be."

The astrologers, being aware that Bábar would be victorious, deserted the camp. Amín Khán also fled from the same place, and presented himself before Bábar. Whilst these events were going on, Hamíd Khán, of the Sultán's own tribe, was coming to the assistance of the Sultán with 4000 sawárs, when he encountered the advance-guard under Prince Muhammad Humáyún, and a battle began, in which Hamíd Khán's troops being defeated, many were killed, and the rest dispersed.

On Thursday the Sultán summoned all his nobles and soldiers, and ordered them to dress themselves in the best clothes they had with them. He caused his embroidered tents and satin canopies to be erected, and all the preparations for a festival to be made. He threw amongst them all the gold, jewels, pearls, and ashrafis which he possessed, and said, "O friends, to-morrow we shall do battle with the Mughal army. If I gain the victory, I will endeavour to please you; if I do not, be at least content with these presents and my declared intentions." The whole of that day was spent in feasting and rejoicing. On the morrow they made ready for war. Sultan Ibrahim, on the one side, marched two kos to the west of Panipat; whilst Babar, on the other, mounting his horse at the sarái of Garaunda, chose his position two kos in the direction of the east.

The Mughal army was 24,000 strong, and that of Sultán Ibráhím numbered 50,000 men 2 and 2000 war elephants. But the entire force of Sultán Ibráhím was disgusted and vexed with his evil deeds. On Friday, the 4th 3 of Rajab, A.H. 932, Ibráhím being destined to die, the armies were ranged in battle array, facing each other. Bábar advanced, and both parties made ready for action. Bábar ordered the Mughals to be separated into three divisions; the advanced guard to remain in its place, and the other two to advance and attack the enemy. Although the Afghán army greatly outnumbered its opponents, yet the soldiers were dispirited and disheartened from the Sultán's ill-treatment, and the nobles were offended. A fierce conflict, nevertheless, took place in the plain to the east of Pánípat: so desperate

³ This is an error. The Tdrikh-i Ddudi says the 8th; though in its version of a Hindí quatrain it has the 7th. The Makhzan-i Afghdni and Tdrikh-i Khdn-Jahdn Lodi say the 7th, Firishta the 10th. Bábar is not quite precise, but signifies that it was either the 7th or 8th, corresponding with April 20th or 21st, 1526.

a battle, indeed, had never been seen. Many of the Sultan's soldiers were killed. He himself was standing with some of his men near him, when Mahmid Khan came forward, and said, "Our affairs are in a very desperate condition; you had better leave the field of battle. If the King is saved, it will be easy to find another army, and again make war against the Mughals. We shall soon be able to find an opportunity of accomplishing our wishes. This is my opinion; but whatever His Majesty thinks is best." The Sultan replied, "O Mahmid Khan, it is a disgrace for kings to fly from the field of battle. Look here, my nobles, my companions, my well-wishers and friends have partaken of the cup of martyrdom. One has fallen here, another there; where then can I now go? My horse's legs are dyed with blood up to his chest. Whilst I was King, I governed the empire as I pleased; now, perfidious Fortune has sided with the Mughals, what pleasure is there in life? It is better that I should be like my friends, in the dust and in blood." On saying this, he rushed into the thickest of the fight, with 5000 brave horsemen, who were all that remained to him of his best troops, and slew many of the Mnghals. After which, towards the close of the day, he obtained martyrdom.1 He fell on the spot where his tomb now is. When Bábar was informed of his death, he was standing in the rear. He sent Diláwar Khán to make inquiries as to the truth of the intelligence. He accordingly went out to the plain where the slain were lying, and beheld that powerful

The Makhzan-i Afghani (MS. 142) adds the following eulogy upon this execrable tyrant:—"On every Friday night an extraordinary number of people are collected at his tomb, and pilgrims present their oblations and prayers in behalf of that falcon of the Empyrean of martyrdom—no King before him having attained that dignity, than which none can be more exalted. May God enlighten and grant him rest in Paradise!" Instead of "oblations and prayers," Dr. Dorn (p. 79) translates "the pilgrims of Narwar and Kanoj," reading instead of inste

Sultan prestrate in the dust and weltering in blood, the royal crown fallen from his head, the state canopy also on the ground.

Diláwar Khán returned and related what he had seen. The tender heart of Bábar prompted him to visit the spot. He raised his head from the earth and said, "Honour to your bravery!" He then commanded brocade to be brought, and sweetments to be propored; and ordered Diláwar Khán and Amír Khalifa to bothe him and bury him where he had fallen. He also directed that care should be taken of the property of Ibráhím. On the same day 2700 horses, and 1500 elephants, and the royal treasure were brought into Bábar's camp.

ACCIDENTS AND OCCURRENCES IN SULTÁN IBRÁHÍM'S REIGN.1

Anecdote of a woman who committed three murders in one house.

There was a man in Sámána who gained his livelihood by trading. He was called away from home on business, and entrusted the care of his house to a trustworthy individual, between whose habitation and his own there was only a wall. neighbour, therefore, used frequently to go into the merchant's house, and assist and advise in all its concerns, and see that matters went on smoothly during the owner's absence. Whenever he went there, he saw a young man frequently entering. He fancied at first that the young man must be some connexion of the owner of the dwelling; but he afterwards reflected that if he were, the house would not have been given into his own charge. He therefore determined to find out all about the youth. He then made a hole in the partition wall, and from time to time looked through it into the next house. One night he saw the young man, dressed in white and scented with perfume, enter the merchant's dwelling, place a handsome carpet near the merchant's wife, and spread out upon it sweetmeats, wine, and pán; after partaking of which, shortly afterwards, they lay down together and indulged in improper familiarities. The woman had a child, which slept in another room, and when it cried she gave it some milk, and then returned to her lover; but as the child persisted in worrying her with its cries, the woman went and squeezed its throat so that it died, and slept the sleep which knows no waking. After which she again sought the youth's embraces. When a short period had passed, the young man said, "Why has not the child cried again for such a long time?" The woman replied, "I have taken steps to prevent it from crying altogether." The young man was greatly disturbed, and inquired what she meant. She answered, "I have killed the boy on your account."

youth said, "O creature, who fearest not God, for the sake of a moment's pleasure you have slain the fruit of your own womb; what confidence can I place in you?" He immediately put on his clothes, with the intention of quitting the place. The woman seized his skirt, saying, "It is through you that I have acted thus, and you cease to love me; for God's sake do one thing to save me from shame. Make a hole in the corner of this room in order that I may bury him." The youth at last reluctantly consented. She accordingly brought a mattock, and gave it to him, and he dug the hole; when the woman brought the child, and gave it to him to conceal it in the ground. The young man, taken in by the woman's artifice, bent down towards the hole for the purpose of placing the child in it; and that deceitful woman then raised the mattock with both hands, and struck him so violently on the head, that she split it in two, and he fell dead into the hole. She covered him over and smoothed down the earth. The neighbour had witnessed all that had happened, and was thunderstruck at the woman's atrocity. Nevertheless, the woman, feigning the deepest grief, went about, weeping and exclaiming, "A wolf has eaten my child."

When, after a lapse of some time, her husband returned, people came to condole with him; and they repeated the usual prayers. When they went away, the friendly neighbour said to him, "Come for a short time to my house to dissipate your melancholy." The merchant accordingly accompanied him, and after they had partaken of food, he related to him the whole history of the deaths of both the child and the young man, and said, "Pretend that you have hidden some gold, and that you want a mattock for the purpose of digging it up." He consented to do this, and the woman, much pleased when she heard about the treasure, readily brought the mattock, upon which he immediately began to dig up in the spot which had been indicated. When the woman perceived that her secret would become known, she fastened the door of the room in which the digging was going on with a chain, and set fire to the roof. When the flames burst forth, she began to cry out for her neighbours to come, as her house had caught fire and her husband was burning. By the time they arrived, the unfortunate man was roasted. The friend had even seen all this likewise, and having collected all the inhabitants of the neighbourhood, went with them to the kotwál, and explained what had occurred. On the receipt of this information, they opened the hole, and found the bodies of the youth and child. They then buried this bloody-minded woman up to the middle, in the centre of the básár, and goaded her with arrows till she died.

Haibat Khán Gurg-andás.

Haibat Khán was called the wolf-slayer, and had thus obtained the name. One day he went out hunting in the neighbourhood of Bayána, and made a pleasant party in the Sikandarí garden, with Daryá Khán Sarwání, Mahmúd Khán Lodí, and Daulat Khán Urmar. While they were seated there, two large wolves carried away some sheep, and the shepherds began to lament loudly. It happened that Haibat Khán had gone to perform the offices of nature. The wolves approached him; he took his bow from a servant, who was in attendance, and as he was a powerful shot, the arrow left the bow, passed through the bodies of both wolves, and stuck in the ground beyond. From that day he received his honorary surname.

At drinking parties he was so liberal that every one wondered. One day Jalál Khán, the brother of Sultán Ibráhím, said, "O Haibat Khán, I have heard that you are generous when intoxicated; if you were so when you are in your senses, I should consider you worthy of praise." Haibat Khán from that day left off drinking wine, and gave away so much, even with his wits about him, that people were still more astounded; for he broke up all his gold and silver drinking vessels, and gave even them away.

One day, an inhabitant of Bayána, by name Múmin, repeated some lines in praise of the Khán, and gave them to the minstrels te recite in the presence of the exalted Khán, on the day when the nobles assembled at his fête. Upon the minstrels' recitation of this panegyric, the Khán presented the earpet, on which he was that day sitting, to the poet, and 2000 tankas to the minstrels. This will serve, in some degree, to show to what an extent he earried his generosity.

REIGN OF SULTÁN BÁBAR.

Historians relate that in the year 932 (1526 A.D.), Shah Babar, the Cenqueror of the World, remained encamped for a week on the battle-field on which he had gained his victory, and made himself master of all the property, elephants, equipages, warliko imploments, etc., of Sultán Ibráhím. Ho considered that that spot had been a fortunate one to him. He summoned the olders of the city, and gained the goodwill of all by his liberality; and made Sultán Muhammad Aughulí, who had cemo to his assistance during that action with great diligence and bravory accompanied by 10,000 horse, governor of Pánípat, and granted him as a gift the revenues due upon one harvest. After which he directed his course towards Dehlí, the inhabitants of which city, from dread of the pride and power of the Mughals, had deserted it. He accordingly despatched worthy men of Hindústán for the purpose of calming the fears of the elders and gentry of the city and its environs, and induce them by promises of the royal favour and liberality to come to the Court of the Protector of the World.

When His Majesty arrived at Sonpath, the chiefs and chaudharis of the city, together with the soldiers and bankers and other classes, went to visit him, and were treated with honour and kindness. During the first two months of His Majesty's reign, he behaved to every one with such kindness and generosity, that dread and terror were banished from the hearts of all men, so that they were well disposed towards his government. He remained a month and some days in the neighbourhood of the fort of Indrapat, on the banks of the river Jumna, and reposed himself there, as it was a pleasant and agreeable spot. In the same year, he sent Amír Khalífa and Amír Kulí Beg to Ágra, where the mother and family of Sultán Ibráhím were; and they went thither by uninterrupted marches. Sultán Ibráhím's mother sent them a list of the property, valuables, treasures, money, gold and jewelled plate, horses, elephants, camels, tents, male and female slaves of the late king, and entreated him to spare her. Mahmúd Khán, a slave of Sultán Ibráhím, took this list, and read it in the presence of Amír Khalífa, who forwarded it to Bábar, and remained himself with his troops to protect the fort and those who were inside it, and at the same time prevent them from quitting it, and taking any of the property away with them.

At this time, news came that some of Ibráhím's nobles had assembled at Jaunpúr, and begun plundering the country. The Conqueror of the World sent Amír Kulí Beg, together with Prince Mírzá Kámrán, in that direction. When the Afgháns received intelligence of the advent of the fortunate prince, they fled towards Patna, and Jaunpúr fell into his hands. Mírzá Kámrán left Amír Kulí Beg there with a large army, and then returned to Court; after which he was ordered into the Panjáb, and Mírzá 'Askarí was appointed to the charge of Kábul, and directed to make himself speedily master of Thatta. Muhammad Humáyún Mírzá, the eldest son of the King and heir-apparent, remained with His Majesty.

When the fortunate princes and valiant nobles had thus been established in different places, information reached the Court of the rebellion of Hasan Khán Mewáttí and Ráná Sánká, who had collected a large force in Mewát. Orders were given for the enlistment of new troops, and Ibráhím's treasures were distributed amongst the army. Hasan Khán was a man of royal descent from several generations, and his family had possessed regal power until the reign of Fíroz Sháh. Ráná Sánká, who was at that time a powerful chief, sent a message to Hasan

Khán, saying, "The Mughals have entered Hindústán, have slain Sultán Ibráhím, and taken possession of the country; it is evident that they will likewise send an army against both of us; if you will side with me, we will be allies, and not suffer them to take possession." Hasan Khán, carried away by the vanity which the possession of so large a force produced, and by the Ráná's message, did not send the presents which he had prepared for the Sultán, and the King's vakil returned home without accomplishing his purpose. These things came to the King's hearing in Agra, and Mírzá Hindál and Muhammad Mahdí Khwája, the king's son-in-law, were sent with an immense army, which was shortly afterwards followed by Bábar himself.

When Hasan Khán was informed of the approach of the victorious army, he sent to tell Ráná Sánká of it. Upon this the Ráná left his home, and assembled an army of Hindús with the intention of making war. He marched and joined Hasan Khán, and prepared for action in the plains near Fírozpúr Jharka. Ráná Sánká placed Hasan Khán on the right, and took up his own post on the left. As he was secretly displeased with Hasan Khár, he determined to ensnare and ruin him. He, therefore, privately sent a vakil to Mírzá Hindál and Khwája Mahdí, to say that he was the slave and obedient servant of the King, and that he consented to the reading of the khutba and the coining of money in His Majesty's name; that Hasan Khán had compelled him to go to war, but that he would not fight the royal troops, but retire early; and that they should make arrangements so that Hasan might be either captured or slain, as in the event of his death they would obtain the country of Mewat.

When the battle began, and both parties were slaughtering one another, Mahdí Khwája attacked Hasan Khán, who was unable to contend with him, and after a short engagement took to flight, and his soldiers were scattered all over the country.

Lád Khán, a slave of Hasan Khán, having displeased him, joined his brothers, and by their advice behaved with infidelity towards his benefactor. When Hasan Khán had been forsaken by all his friends and followers, and no one remained with him, he arrived at a well, and said to his servant, "If you have anything to eat, bring it." He brought some cakes and roast meat, and placed them before him. He had eaten only a few morsels, when a noble of Shah Babar arrived. Hasan Khan arose in a state of confusion, with the intention of mounting, when his servant drew his sword on him, wounded him, and threw him into the well: after which, he seized his horse, and fled. After his flight, Hindú Beg pursued and plundered his army, none of whom attempted to resist. The troops of the Vanquisher of the Universe obtained immense booty in horses, camels, etc., and gained a great victory. That district was entirely subdued, from one end to the other, and collectors were appointed in various places. Orders were issued for reading the khutba and coining money, and a jágir was bestowed upon the fortunate Sháhzáda.

One year after His Majesty's accession, Mírzá Kámrán came from Lahore, and brought many horses and much wealth, which he had taken from the Bhattis and Khokars (Ghakhars), which he presented to the Sultán. About this time, news arrived from Jaunpur, that Sultan Muhammad, the Afghan, had assumed regal authority in Bihár, caused money to be struck and the khutba to be read in his own name, and had brought an army against Mírzá Hindál, who, not being strong enough to resist him, fled from Jaunpur, and was pursued by the troops of Sultan Muhammad. At last, the Mírzá gave him battle, and lost many men. His Majesty appointed Sultán Junaid Birlás and Haidar Malik Húlak to proceed with other Mughals and a Hindústání army. Junaid made two marches in one, and arrived there, and faced Sultán Muhammad. Such fighting took place as no age has witnessed. The Afghans were unable to resist the impetuous valour of the Mughals, and were dispersed. Jaunpur again fell to the Sultán, and an account of the victory, together with the spoil and horses, was sent to the Imperial Court. Sultán Junaid was directed to remain there, and to send the Mírzá to the presence. Junaid behaved in such a way towards the Afgháns that no one sided with them, and the hearts of the rebellious Afghans and other disaffected men were filled with terror and dread of him. Mírzá Hindál was again sent to Kandahár, and in the second year of His Majesty's reign a beautiful garden was made on the borders of the river Junna, and pathways were introduced into Hindústán for the first time, they not having been in use before. He passed his time in that garden, in company with Mughal companions and friends, in pleasure and enjoyment and carousing, in the presence of enchanting dancing girls with rosy checks, who sang tunes, and displayed their accomplishments. The Mughals, who had for many years desired the possession of Hindústán, at last governed it. Mírzá Kámrán also prepared a splendid garden similar to this in Lahore. Amír Khalífá, being a person of influence, and possessing the chief authority, managed the government, and his decrees were like those of the Sultan himself.

When the royal affairs had been well and firmly established, and the mandates of the King had spread over land and sea like running water, the Rájá of Chanderí rebelled. Arghún Khán, who was in that province, attacked him. The Rájá, however, plundered on the road tho money which was being sent to the royal treasury. The Ruler of the Universe sent Arghún Khán's brother and Ahmad Sultán against him with a strong force. The Chanderi Raja, being puffed up with vanity on account of tho defeat which Arghún Khán had sustained, camo out of Chanderi with an army of Hindús, and a battle took place near a village called Pádahar, in which ho likewise defeated Arghún Khán's brother, together with his troops, and returned victorious to Chanderi. After this misfortune, Amir Khalifa received orders to prepare all the royal equipage. When it was ready, His Majesty left Agra in state, and marched steadily in that direction, having previously despatched Amír Hindú Beg with 6000 gallant horsemen. 'Aliwardi Khán Shámlú, who was then in Málwá, received instructions to join Amír Hindú Beg, for the purpose of destroying that infidel. The Rájá of Chanderí, being very proud of his success, collected his adherents from all quarters, and appointed his nephew to oppose those two valiant and warlike chieftains. A battle was fought between them on the banks of the river Jumna. In the first attack, the infidels behaved with such extreme valour, that many of the men of the army of the King of the World became martyrs. When the two amirs saw that their soldiers were terrified at the Hindús. they retreated, and took refuge in a garden, and the nephew of Shahrak retired to a garden two kos distant. When the King was told of the defeat of these two amirs, he marched towards the enemy. On the amirs being informed of the King's arrival, they divided their forces in two on a very dark night, darker than the heart of an oppressor, fell on the infidels, and took their revenge. They killed most of the evil-doers, and made prisoners of the remainder; and so much plunder was taken from that heathen army, that the King's troops obtained sufficient to support them for years. His Majesty marched on towards Chanderí. But when the Rájá heard of the defeat of his brother, he was confounded, because that profligate wretch was a great warrior. Not knowing what else to do, he assembled a body of men, and came to fight the Sultán. That vanquished one did not know how difficult it is for a gnat to keep its feet when a cold boisterous wind is blowing, or for a sparrow to fly against a hawk. In the very first onset, that dark-faced man was overthrown, and his army slaughtered. When the chiefs of the Rájá had been trampled on by elephants, His Majesty encamped near Chanderi with much pomp. The warriors of his vanguard, having already taken the fort, made captives of the connexions and family of the Rájá, and despatched them to the foot of the royal throne. His Majesty presented two of the daughters of the Rájá, whose beauty was unrivalled, who had never been exposed to the view of man, or to the hot winds, one to Mírzá Kámrán, the other to Prince Muhammad Humáyún, and gave the others to the sardars of his army. After which he spent two months in that place, in country excursions and hunting, and then returned to Agra.

In the third year His Majesty proceeded towards Lahore. At Sirhind he was met by the Rájá of Kahlúr, who presented him seven falcons and three mans of gold, and was confirmed in the zamindári of that place. When the King's camp reached Lahore, Mírzá Kámrán was honoured by admission to the presence, and he brought the samindárs of the country to kiss the feet of the Conqueror of the World. The King's encampment was located in the environs of Lahore, and the royal tents were pitched in the garden of Mírzá Kámrán, who gave a magnificent banquet, which lasted three days. At its conclusion the King left the garden, and took up his abode in the fort. The whole road thither, from the garden to the gate of the city, was lined by the servants of Sháhzáda Kámrán, dressed in silk and brocade, decked like bridegrooms; and the troops, with their gay red and yellow flags, resembling the early spring. adorned with gilded trappings, covered with jewels, were led in front of the royal cortège. When they entered the city-gate, money was thrown to the poor and destitute, and a grand entertainment was given in the palace of Sikandar Lodí.

The King was pleased with the sights and hunting which the Panjáb afforded, and he therefore remained there for the space of a year, during which Mírzá Hindál came from Kábul. He was admitted to the presence, and treated with marked distinction. When the cold season was over, Mírzá Hindál returned to Kábul, and at the time of his departure he received, as a present from His Majesty, two elephants, four horses, girdles, and jewelled daggers.

On the fourth day of the month of Rajab, the exalted monarch set forth on his return to Agra. When he reached Sirhind, one of the kázis of Sámána complained to him that Mohan Mundáhir had attacked his estate (imlák) and burned it, plundered all his property, and slain his son. His Majesty, the Conqueror of the World, appointed 'Alí Kulí Hamadání, with three thousand horse, to avenge the injury which the Mundáhir had done to the petitioner. 'Alf Kuli proceeded against the village of the Mundálirs. By chance a marriage was being celebrated amongst the Mundálirs, when he approached them with the intention of attacking them. It being winter-time when the King's troops arrived there, in the morning, they were unable to pull their bows, on account of the severe cold. The Mundálirs, who had just risen from warming themselves before fires in their houses, discharged such flights of arrows that the soldiers were unable to withstand them. Many fell, and 'Alí Kulí was unable to effect anything on account of the vigilance of the Kanwárs. The army retreated into the jangal, where they collected a quantity of wood, set fire to it, and relieved themselves from the rigour of the weather; after which, they again assaulted the village, but were again repulsed.

When information of this was conveyed to the King, he sent Tarsam Bahadur and Naurang Beg, with 6000 cavalry and many elephants. They reached that place one night, when the Mundáhirs were celebrating another marriage, and enjoying themselves. Towards morning the army was divided into three portions: one was sent to the west, and ordered to show itself. When the Mundáhirs, proud of the defeat which 'Alí Kulí had sustained, came forward to the attack, according to instructions received, the Royalist troops turned their backs and fled, followed by the Kanwars, until they arrived at the distance of one kos from the village. Tarsam Bahádur took advantage of this opportunity to attack and set fire to the village, and put all the inhabitants to death. When the Mundahirs perceived the flames, they ran towards their homes, but were intercepted on their road and attacked by the Royalists, sword in hand. Nearly a thousand of them were killed, and a thousand men, women, and children taken prisoners. The slaughter was great, and there was a heap of severed heads; and Mohan was taken alive. An account of the conquest of the village was sent to the Shah. The village had been fully inhabited for no less than 160 years in the pargana of Kaithal; but was then made, and still continues to be, a desert, and has never been inhabited again, although 160 years have clapsed since its destruction. When the prisoners were brought to Dehlí, all the women were given to the Mughals. The offending Mundáhir was buried in the earth up to his waist, and then pierced to death with arrows.2

Such was the respect for the army which this produced amongst the people of Hind, that thenceforth no one ventured either to rebel or disobey. After this His Majesty passed two months in hunting and other amusements in the neighbourhood of Dehli. He then turned his face towards Agra, and sent Prince Muhammad Humáyún, with a large force, into the sùba of Sambhal, and declared him his successor. The following was the cause of his selection. One evening the King was in his caps, and summoned Muhammad Humáyún. When that offspring of the royal tree came into the presence, His Majesty, overpowered by the wine, had fallen asleep on his pillow. The Shahzada remained there standing, motionless, with his hands joined. When the King awoke from sleep at midnight, he beheld him standing, and said, "When did you come?" He replied, "When I received your commands." The King then remembered having sent for him, and was much gratified, and said, "If God should grant you the throne and crown, do not put your brothers to death, but look sharply after them." The Sháhzáda bowed down to the ground and acquiesced in all that His Majesty said, so that, notwithstanding that Mírzá 'Askárí and Mírzá Hindál treated him a hundred times with disrespect, and even went to war with him, he, nevertheless, when he had vanquished them, ceased to think of their hostile proceedings. Whenever they came before him, he treated them with the greatest affection, and never reminded them of the rancour they displayed towards him. To be brief, Mírzá Humáyún was sent with a large army into the suba of Sambhal.

² It is strange that there should be no mention of this transaction either in the large histories or the Memoirs of Babar.

Two or three months after this event, it became evident that His Majesty's health failed him. He was carried to his garden on the bank of the river, and Amír (Khalífá) Nizámu-d dín prescribed for him, and also managed the business of the State. When the King's sickness increased day by day, and he was convinced that there was now no hope of life, he determined to provide the empire with a ruler, and prevent it from falling into a stranger's hands; so he confirmed his previous election. His illness at length became so severe at Agra, that, in the year 937 H., he departed, by the decree of the Almighty, from this earth to heaven, and forsook this thorny world of trouble for the rose-garden of paradise.

The reign of Sultan 'Adali Sur.

¹After three days had been devoted to mourning the death of Islám Sháh, on the fourth, his eldest son, Fíroz Sháh, was placed upon the throne, and the chiefs and nobles, in compliance with the will of the deceased monarch, came forward and professed allegiance. They² distributed a donative of two months' pay amongst the soldiers, and issued their orders to the governors of the súbas. They elected Táj Khán Kirání to the wisárat, and Kutb Khán Níází, equally skilful with his pen and sword, was nominated bakhshi.

As Fíroz Khán was but young, being only twelve years old, and had no experience in matters of government, Táj Khán issued whatever orders he chose to the nobles, but he was well-affected to the interests of the state and of his pageant master. Nevertheless, some disaffected nobles did not approve of this arrangement, and after consulting together, represented to Bíbí Báí, the mother of Fíroz Khán, that Táj Khán was a seditious intriguing person, and though he had been raised to high power by Islám Sháh, and was admitted to his intimate friendship, yet that monarch did not centre all power in him. You have now constituted him absolute minister, and he, already contemplating the acquisition of supreme power, has summoned his brethren, and intends to remove this child from the throne and occupy it himself." She inquired of them what she ought to do. They replied, "Send him to the súba of Málwá, to supply the place of Shujá' Khán." After giving the matter a little reflection, Bíbí Báí sent him to Málwá, though he was the prop of her son's empire, and all the other nobles quailed before his presence, and Islám Sháh on his death-bed had expressly consigned the boy to his care.

^{&#}x27; [Translated by Sir H. Elliot.]

About a month after Táj Khán's departure, Mamrez Khán¹ her brother, son of Míán Nizám, brother of Sher Sháh (who had lived at Bayana, feigning eccentricity and madness, in order to escape death or blinding under the late reign), thought this a good opportunity of offering his congratulations to his nephew, and, under that pretence, of making away with him and seizing the crown for himself. With this view, he entered into a secret correspondence with some of the nobles whom he brought over to his interests. So after two months,2 he entered Gwalior with a large army, and, all covered with dust as he was, went direct into the presence of Fíroz Khán, with the intention of seizing and expelling him. His sister, astonished at seeing him under an aspect different from that under which she had ever beheld him, stood between him and her son, and exclaimed, "Mamrez Khán, what are you dreaming of? Have you no fear of God before your eyes, that you seek to extinguish my lamp by the blast of violence, and seat me in the dust of oppression? You also have children. Did I not save you from the hands of Islám Sháh, and is this the reward I am to receive?"

² It does not say from what time, but we may presume the death of Islâm Shâh. According to other authors, this murder occurs within a week (three days being the general statement) after this event, and we hear nothing whatever of the ministry of Taj Khân Kirânî, or his transfer to Mâlwâ, and the whole statement is so entirely at variance with others, that we must reject it.

But all her cries and remonstrances were of no avail, for the wretch severed the child's head from his body, and thus accumulated curses upon himself for ever. After killing Firoz Khán, he came out again from the palace, and, with the consent of two or three of the devilish nobles who were with him, seated himself on the throne. Then were all astonished and perturbed, and a tunnelt arose in the city.

² Seven days after the slaughter of Fíroz Khán, Mamrez Khan came to the throne. Before he took possession of it, he cansed tents of damask and brocade to be erected in the bazár; after which, be scated himself on the throne and assumed the title of 'Adil Shúh.3 He opened the treasures of Islám Sháh and Sher Shah, and scattered them with an unsparing hand amongst the people, so that they thought little of the murder of Fíroz Khán.4 As there was no member of Sher Sháh's family to succeed to the crown, the nobles sided with him, and were honoured with titles and dignities. When, after two months, he found that every one was well inclined towards him, he turned his face towards Chunár, where the treasures of Sher Sháh were. After conciliating the Kanjúrs, he came to Gwhlior, and thence led an army himself against Salim Súr, who had rebelled on the ground of the murder of Firoz Khán. When he came into that neighbourhood, Salím Khán, finding himself unable to cope with

² [From this point to the end the translation is Mr. Mackenzie's.]

⁵ The Makhan-i Afghaini says this name was changed to 'Adali, which Dorn says signifies 'foolish.' In one MS. of the work it is said the name was changed into be-adal, unjust. [Firishta's version of the nick-name is different. He says it was the Hindi audhali, 'blind.'] The Waki dt-i Mushtaki (MS. p. 142) says he was raised to the throne with the title of Sultan Mahmud.

him, fled to the hill country, and was pursued by a large army sent after him by 'Adil Shah.

After remaining a month in that place, he despatched an army against the Rájá of Andrún. When he arrived in his country, the Rájá went to the fort of Kisht, at the foot of which he eansed outworks to be erected, which he gave in charge to his chiefs. The Hindus made use of 'aradas and manjaniks, and placed large cannon on the bastions of the fort, and kept up such constant volleys of stones, that a bird would have found it impossible to fly past. The Afghans also prepared trenehes and batteries and made war; but by no means could they contrive to gain the victory, and they lost many of their men. They cast fiery missiles (hukkahá-i átish) into the fort; while from the inside of the castle the defenders threw bags of cotton steeped in oil and set on fire. By this means many men were burned on both sides, and 'Adil Shah was much distressed at the state of his prospects. He lost men daily during a whole month. At length, one night, he beheld in a dream a venerable man of brilliant countenance, who said to him, "You will conquer this fort if you do one thing." 'Adil Shah said, "Darreshes tako more interest in the condition of Islam than kings do; you ought not to withhold your prayers from the army of the faithful, because the Musulmáns are sorely distressed in this affair. If I return without gaining the victory, I shall destroy the royal name; and if I endeavour to obtain possession of the fort, many Musulmáns will fall: for this reason my soul is immersed in the river of anxiety." The darwesh replied, "There is a shopkeeper in your army whose name is Zanká, who has a daughter, the splendour of whose beauty exceeds that of the sun, and whose face puts the roses of the garden to shame; the locks of her hair are lovelier than the hyacinth: buy her from her father for whatever sum he may ask, dress her in costly garments, deck her with jewels, and send her on horseback in the direction of the desert before the rose of the sun has risen from the garden of the east. After which, make ready your army, and attack the fort on all sides.

With the blessing of God, you will be victorious." After he had said this, the King awoke. In the morning he summoned his confidential chiefs into his private apartment, and related the dream to them, and made inquiries after the shopkeeper. The kotwál searched for him, and brought him to the foot of the throne. They satisfied him with presents and money, and received his daughter, whom they dressed in fine clothes and jewels, and sent off to the desert at the time indicated by the She had scarcely reached the distance of a bow-shot, when a rosy-cheeked young man, whose beard had not yet begun to grow, came from the opposite direction; he had a gilt saddle and jewelled trappings, and rode a cream-coloured horse, and had a gold-worked quiver fastened to his waist, with a tiger's tail hanging from it, with a regal cap set jauntily on his head, and plumes from the wings of the si-murgh. That fair girl made him a salám, and they both took the road of the desert. The men who accompanied the lady were confounded at the wonderful and mysterious occurrence which they had witnessed, and were still further astounded, when, in the twinkling of an eye, they both disappeared from their sight. Upon this, they returned, and told what had happened to 'Adil Sháh, and the wise men of the age who were there present were wonder-struck.

Proclamation was made by beat of drum, that the soldiers should prepare for battle. They advanced against the fort. By the decree of the Most Mighty, such dread had taken possession of the defenders, that they sent a message to the effect, that, "If Dáúd Khán would bring a written promise of mercy from the King, the Rájá would give up the fort to His Majesty's troops, and come to pay his respects." Dáúd Khán sent this message to 'A'dil Sháh, who was much astonished, and said, "O Dáúd Khán, I was put to great annoyance by this fort, because so many of the faithful had fallen and were falling. I could not gain possession of it. I therefore felt inclined to leave it, and return to Gwálior; but now I have proved the truth of the promises of a darwesh. Thank God, he has not misled me. Go and give them my written promise of mercy." Dáúd Khán did as he was directed. The Rájá came into the presence with his turban suspended from his neck, and the fort was vacated. Much treasure and many fine elephants and horses were presented to 'Adil Sháh. The King gave the fort into Dáúd Khán's charge, and returned thence victorious to Gwálior.

When he had reigned two years, and his authority was firmly established, he began to treat the nobles with severity. There was a man named Hímún, who was a weighman in the básár, who had found means to approach the King on different affairs, and in whom he daily reposed more and more confidence. By degrees he became very powerful and influential, so that he managed the business of the State. About this time, Junaid Khán, the son of Ahmad Khán, who was governor of Bayána, and his son, the faujdár of Ajmír, rebelled in Ajmír, plundering and spoiling certain parganas of that province, making prisoners of the women and children, and gaining much booty, which he gave to his men. By all which he succeeded in collecting a large force, the motions of which he directed with great expertness and address.

'Adil Sháh had at this time gone to Chunár; Jamál Khán, who was in Gwálior, assembled a force and went out against him with seventeen elephants in his train. A battle was fought at Kanúlápúr, near Ladánah. The fighting was severe. Junaid Khán overcame Jamál Khán at the first onset, and slew many of his best men. He also obtained much plunder, horses, elephants, etc. When this news reached the King, he was greatly distressed. Hímún said, "O Lord of the World, if you will trust me with a small force, I will either overcome Junaid Khán, or perish in the attempt." 'Adil Sháh at first objected to this, on account of the meanness of his origin, but at length he yielded to his solicitations, and sent him with 3000 or 4000 horse and four elephants. He set off, and Junaid Khán, vain of his victory over Jamál Khán, took no notice of him, saying, "My grooms will knock ont his brains with the pegs to which their horses are fastened." He then ordered Danlat Khán, who was the superintendent of his stable, to proceed against him with a large army, and enjoined him not to kill Hímán, but to bring him alive into the presence. He gave him leave to depart, and himself went to hunt tigers. How very reprehensible is arrogance!

Danlat Khán went, after making all his arrangements, and towards the close of day found himself within a kos of Himun's army. He sent some boastful and foolish messages to Himún, saying, "O shopkeeper, why do you meddlo with war? Return to your scales and weights." Himun sent no answer, but allowed him to remain in his fancied security. When night came, he called the Afghans, and said, "Junaid Khan, in the first place, defeated our troops, and is vain-glorious on that account; to-morrow, if you behave valiantly, we have every hope of gaining the victory, and you will be praised and honoured by His Majesty." The Afghans, on hearing this, declared their intention of doing their best in the battle which was about to ensue, saying, that "Victory was in the hands of God." When the light of the sun parted the curtain of darkness, the brave men of both parties mixed together. Providence decreed success to the banners of 'Adil Shah. Daulat Khan was slain, and his army put to flight. Himun pursued them for two kos, and put many to death; a portion of them only managed by a thousand devices to savo their lives from the swords of the royal troops.

When Junaid Khán was informed of this, his head, which he had lifted to the heavens, was brought low. He ordered his troops to prepare for action, and marched with the intention of fighting. Towards night he arrived close to the army of 'Adil Sháh, and encamped. After counting his troops, he found that he had with him 8000 cavalry and 3000 foot, whom he had assembled from different quarters, together with ten warelephants and a numerous artillery. During the night he endeavoured to infuse spirit into his men.

When Himin saw the large force of the enemy he was disturbed, because he had only brought 3000 horsemen with him, and many of his men were wounded. He came to the conclusion that he could not cope with the fee by day. He said, "If yon, who are warriers, are of this opinion, which has firm possession of me, we may hope for success." All the Afghans said, "Your opinion is ours." Himin said, "I advise a night attack to be made on their army, let what may happen." He then picked out one body of 2500 horsemen, and kept 1000 himself, with the intention of attacking the enemy from two different quarters, with kettle-drams sounding, during the last watch of the night, and putting them all to the sword.

With this view he prepared his men for the attack. The enemy remained on the alert during three watches of the night; but in the last watch they grow negligent, and fell asleep. When they were overpowered by drowsiness, the soldiers of 'Adil Shah fell furiously on them on all sides, and awoke them with the sound of drams and trampets. Himán did not give them time to put on their armour, and the Afghans, sword in hand, passed through their army, slaughtering all they met, and many also foll by the hands of their comrades. They took to flight, and suffered severe loss from His Majesty's troops.

When Junaid Khán saw that he was unsuccessful, he thought himself lucky in being ablo to save his life, and fled alone to the desert; all who were not cut to pieces also saved themselves by flight. The spoil which this victory granted by the Almighty yielded, amounted to 200 camels, with daggers and swords innumerable. A portion of this was given to the army as a reward for its valour, the remainder was forwarded to 'Adil Sháh. Hímún despatched an account of the victory to His Majesty two days before he set forth himself. He then went to Court, taking the plunder with him, and gave a detailed account of the war and of his victories, and showed the articles of booty one by one to the King. He then stood with folded hands in front of the throne. 'Adil Shah honoured him with a purple khil'at, the collar and skirt of which were covered with jewels. Himin said, "I am a miserable chopkeeper, and can of myself do nothing. To Your Majesty's good fortune this success is due. But the swords and hravery of these soldiers are the means. Your Majesty should first recompense them." The King praised this speech, and rewarded all those who had distinguished themselves in the field, by giving them high mansabs and splendid dresses of honour.

On account of this war, Himun's power increased greatly. One day, at the time at which the King was in the habit of quitting his private apartments, the nobles were seated in the Darbar-i 'amm, and jagirs were being distributed. Ibrahim Khan, who had married 'Adil Shah's sister, entered, and all the amirs rose to sainte him, with the exception of Toj Khon, one of the chief nobles as well as warriors, who remained sitting in his place. Ibráhím Khán was vexed at this, and became inimically disposed towards Táj Khán. Some days after this, Táj Khán went to pay his respects to 'Adil Shah. The day was very cloudy, and he was assaulted by an Afghán, named Nizám Khán, in the doorway of the audience chamber, which was itself a dark place, independent of the darkness which the clouds occasioned. He was, however, only slightly wounded. Taj Khán attributed this attempt to Ibráhím and 'Adil Sháh. When, after a week or so, his wounds were healed, he made ready his adherents, and advanced from Gwálior in the direction of Bengal. Information of this was soon conveyed to 'Adil Shah, who sent a large force to pursue him, and much fighting took place. Khán forced his way, sword in hand, and the royal troops returned. After this, Táj Khán went to Ahmad Khán, who was governor of Jaunpur, and a relation of his. 'Adil Shah sent a farmán, enjoining him to induce Táj Khán to come back, seeing that the cause of his displeasure did not originate with the King, but was entirely owing to his enemies. Ahmad Khán did all he could to persuade Táj Khán, who, however, would not listen to him.1

'Adil Shah's suspicions caused divers of the nobles to be inimical to him. Ho put Daulat Khán Jalwání and Fíroz Khán Kákar to death, and pulled up the root of his empire with his own hands by killing these two amirs, who were the pillars of his monarchy. He then began to entertain evil intentions towards Nasíb Khán Sarwání, Isma'il Khán, Alláh-dád Khán Miána, and Nizám Khán Sáhú-khail, and he became daily more ill-disposed towards the nobles. 'Adii Shah's sister, the wife of Ibráhím Khán, went one day to her brother's house, and learned from some of the women there, who had long been friends of hers, that the King was ill-disposed towards her husband, and meditated some evil design against him. She being very fond of her husband, was much distressed at this news, left the palace in a lurry, and went to her own house, where she told what she had heard to Ibráhím, who, being seized with a panic, fled from Gwalior and went to Delili. When 'Adil Shah was informed of his departure, he sent a large army in pursuit of him, and a battle took place near Agra. The King's forces sustained a total defeat, and Ibráhím Khán marched victorious into Agra.2

Jalál Khán, who was in the province of Sirhind, also joined Ibráhím Khán, and made over to him all the money which had been collected from the parganas of that province. Mahmúd Khán Púndak, Nizám Khán, and Alif Khán likewise allied themselves with him, so that he mustered about 3000 cavalry. He caused the khutba to be read and coin to be struck in his name, and raised the standard of rebellion. Whilst this was going on, 'Adil Sháh had gone to the treasury of Chunár; but when he heard of the insurrection of Ibráhím Khán, he marched

² At that time Ibrahim Khan's father, Ghazi Khan Sur, was governor of Bayana and Ilindun.

Whilst they were thus despairing of their success, it happened by the blessing of God, that one of the zamburaks or swivels of the royal army was discharged. It struck the Rájú of Andardún, who was standing in front of his army, on the head; his skull was knocked to pieces, and his brains scattered like the fragments of a cheese. When the Rájú's men saw this, they all took to flight. Nizám Khán, seeing that the infidels had suddenly dispersed, believed that some unforeseen event had occurred, and made a slight attack on them with his remaining troops. The infidels fled before them, and on advancing they found the Rájá of Andardún lying in the midst of dust and blood. They returned thanks to God, and sent news of the victory to 'Adil Sháh, and counselled him to come speedily to Ujjain. His Majesty was astonished at the mysterious dispensations of Providence, and pursued the fugitives until he reached Ujjain. The Rájá's men resisted during three hours, but at last gave way; his wives and children were taken prisoners, and such spoil of horses, camels, elephants, gold, jewels, property, and clothes was obtained, that the soldiers had wherewithal to support themselves for years.

After this victory, 'Adil Shah passed some time in Malwa, and Ibrahim Khan at this time availed himself of the opportunity thus afforded, and extended his authority. Having collected much money from the different parganas of the provinces, he despatched his emissaries in all directions, and gained the whole country from Dehli to Rohtas. When 'Adil Shah arrived from Malwa, and heard of the power and success of Ibrahim Khan, he was distressed. He felt satisfied that it would be necessary to proceed against him in person, and ordered the necessary preparations to be made for that purpose.

At this time, Mansúr Khán, who was a young man of great courage, and had married the King's younger sister, excited 'Adil Sháh's suspicions. He was anxious to hinder him from revolting like Ibráhím Khán, and, therefore, determined either to blind him with a red-hot bodkin or slay him. His wife was by some means or other informed of this, and told her husband that "she had learnt in various places that 'Adil Sháh was desirous of either putting him to death or blinding him, and that if he wished to save his life he had better fly." Mansúr Khán had suspected this from the first. His wife said, "You have 4000 horse, who are your ancient servants: and I have much gold and property in jewels; let us sell it, and obtain adherents. As Ibráhím Khán forsook this place, and obtained such extensive anthority by his courage, do you also, in like mannor, not only avoid the chance of destruction, but increase your possessions."

Mansúr Khán listened to the wife's advice, which was given in the spirit of a man; and one day, under the pretext of limiting, when informed by his spies that 'Adil Shah was in his cups, left Gwálior (having previously sent off his troops and baggage), and arrived at Dehlí, where he had an interview with Ibráhím, who entertained him hospitably for two or three days, after which he requested Ibráhím to give him charge of the Panjáb, and merit his gratitude by doing so, since it had pleased the Most High to make Ibrahim a man high in authority, and the possessor of an extensive territory. Ibráhím's youthful, overbearing pride led him to be displeased at this. Next day, Mansúr Khán sent his mother and wife to the wife of Ibráhím Khán, and told them to entreat her to persuade Ibráhím Khán to entrust the Panjáb to him. His wife and mother went there, and said to her 1 sister (the wife of Ibráhím), "You are like a mother to us. God has exalted you, and given you great possessions; and if through your means the land of the Panjáb be given by your husband to mine, I shall consider myself your slave, and my husband will become one of your servants." The elder sister consented, and sent them away with a present of gold and jewels. At bedtimo that evening she related what had happened to her husband. Ibráhím Khán's pride again caused him to refuse to listen to the request, and she, being vexed, arose and left him. In the morning the wife told her sister of the denial she had met with. Mansur was enraged at this, and determined to have one trial of arms with Ibráhím He deliberated with his trusty Afgháns, and said, "What is the good of this life to me? If the Most High grants me success, my situation will be bettered; at all events, it will be better to die than remain in this wretched condition."

As God had decreed that Mansúr Khán should be victorious, all the nobles and Afghans of note joined him, and agreed with him in overything, so that he mustored 8000 horsemen. Ibráhím, however, commanded 30,000. Mansúr Khán made ready for war, and sent to Ibráhím to say, "Great friendship existed between us; but you have forsaken the path of affection, and it is unworthy of a man to be led away by pride, and forget the rules of courtesy. Let what will happen, I will come and essay one trial in arms against you." Ibráhím laughed at this messago, and said, "Why do you seek death beneath the feet of my elephants?" At last, on Friday, the 7th of Sha'ban, a severo action was fought.1 It pleased the Almighty to overshadow the banners of Mansúr Khán, and Ibráhim, being routed, fled to Sambhal, in spito of his 30,000 cavalry and many olephants.2 His troops descried him, and came and pledged thoir allegiance to Mansúr Khán, who, after the victory, prostrated himself in thanksgiving on the field. He collected the army, the elophants, horses, treasures, and household property, etc., and came speedily to Dehlí, where he took possession of the throne, and issued orders for the reading of the khutba and coining of money in his own name. Ibráhím's overweening pride caused him to lose all his possessions, and he fled towards the East.

Mansúr Khán assumed the title of Sikandar,³ and from that day [962 A.H. (1554 A.D.)] his prosperity increased.⁴ 'A'dil Sháh ruled the country from Jaunpúr to Málwá. He endeavoured to wrest his conquests from Sikandar, but did not succeed. Sikandar agreed to own him as his liege lord, and wrote to him, saying, "I am a friend of yours, and will behave like one of the other nobles. You are my King." In effect, he always treated 'Adil Shah with great consideration.

² Other authorities, as the Makhzan-i Afghdni and Türtkh-i Khan-Jahan Lodi, represent Ibrahim's eavalry at 70,000 men. We are also told that there were no less than 200 of his officers who occupied tents lined with velvet, each having the privilege of beating the naubat.—See Briggs' Firishta, vol. ii., p. 147.

⁴ According to Firishta he ascended the throne at Agra in 962 H. He makes him out to be the nephew of Sher Shah, and says that his sister was married to 'Adalf. Our author has just said that 'Adalf's sister was married to him.

At this time, three different khutbas were read in the empire of Hindústán, and money was coined in the names of three monarchs, when before there had been only one khutba and one person's name on the money. The country from Agra to Málwá, and the confines of Jaunpúr, owned the sovereignty of 'Adil Sháh; from Dehlí to the smaller Rohtás on the road to Kábul, it was in the hands of Sháh Sikandar; and from the borders of the hills to the boundaries of Gujarát, it belonged to Ibráhím Khán.²

When Humáyún Sháh received intelligence of the feeble rule of 'Adil Sháh, the dissensions of the nobles, and the partition of the territories of Hind, he felt persuaded that the discordance which then existed amongst the Afgháns would enable him to take easy possession of Hindústán, and he therefore made up his mind to invade it. But his differences with his brothers. Mírzá Kánirán, 'Askarí, and others, who had wrested many of his territories from him, together with the small number and unprepared state of his troops, opposed great obstacles. wished to go to Mariam Makání, and seek succour and assistance from her. On a prosperous day, he sent Khwaja Mu'azzam and Bairam Khán to fetch Mariam Makání and Prince Akbar, who went with expedition and brought them. As the winds were exceedingly hot, Akbar Mírzá spent that time on the borders of Mahain. From thence King Humáyún set off with 200 men, Bairam Khán, Khwája Mu'azzam, Bábá-dost Bakhshí, Khwája Ghází, Muhammad Haidar Akhtabegí, Mírzá Kulí Beg and his brothers, Shaikh Yúsuf, Ibráhím the Lame, and Hasan Kulí, all nobles of note.

[The history of Humáyún, which follows in the MS., is copied verbatim from the Tabakát-i Akbari, as hereafter given among the Extracts from that work. The following account of the battle of Sirhind is the only passage in which Ahmad Yádgár differs from the Tabakát.]

Battle of Sirhind.

The tents of the Prince Akbar Mírzá had been pitched near the fort at the Hauz-i Rasúlána. All the Kháns displayed on this day great courage and valour, such as it would be impossible to exceed, and they obtained their desires. Sikandar Súr fled, forsaking everything that appertained to the possession of the empire, and the victorious troops pursued the enemy, and put many of them to the sword. Sikandar escaped with a few followers. Two hundred and fifty elephants, and three hundred and odd horses, treasure, gold and silver vessels, and all the palace furniture, were captured. Muhammad Akbar came victorious into His Majesty's presence, and made the customary congratulations. His Majesty honoured that lamp of brilliancy with an ornamented khil'at and a jewelled crown, and made him happy by granting him the high title of heir-apparent. He also gave him twenty elephants and 100 horses out of the spoil. The munshis despatched farmans describing the victory in every direction, and they attributed the success to the skill of the Prince of the World and the valour of his servants.

Continuation of the reign of 'Adali.

When intelligence of what had occurred to Humáyún reached Chunár, 'Adil Sháh deliberated with his courtiers, and determined that, as the Mughal army had lost their king, they must be disheartened and distressed; that if they were attacked by a large force, they would fly without fighting, and Dehli would easily be taken; that Sikandar was in the Siwálik hills in a state of great want; and that there was no one sufficiently powerful to have designs against Dehlí. Hímún observed, "If the King will send Ahmad Khán Súr, Alláh-dád Khán Sarwání, and Daulat Sháh Kirání, with a large army, and some powerful elephants, with me, by the fortune of the King, I will overthrow the Mughal troops, and gain possession of Dehlí. There was a soothsayer in 'Adil Sháh's servico, who could interpret the appearances of the heavens as easily as ho could the signs on an astrological table. He was extremely skilful in explaining everything that related to the heavenly bodies. The King said to him, "I am about to send an army against Dehlí. You must therefore pay great attention to the state of the heavens, and then tell fearlessly what you have learnt before the throno." The man spent three days in carefully contemplating the stars and aspects, and then went before the King, and said, "This I have learned from the revolutions of the heavens and the changes of day and night,—that after Humáyún, his son, who is seated on the Imperial throne, will be entrusted with the entire government of Hind, and the rulers of all countries will place their foreheads in the dust before his throne, and no one will vanquish him. The land of Hindústán, from Kandahár to the sea of tho south, and from Kambháyit (Cambay) to the sea of Bengal, will own his sway." 'Adil Shah was much dispirited at this unfavourable speech. Himún said, "O King, the case is thus: he is now a child ten years old, who has lost his father, and the Mughal army is not yet firmly established. It is easy to root up a small plant." 'A'dil Shah derived confidence from his speech, and prepared a powerful force. He sent 7000 horsemen and twenty war-elephants with Himun; who went, march by march, to Gwálior.

'Alí Kulí, who was at that place, came against him. The valour of the Afghán troops enabled thom to overcome him in the first attack, and many Mughals fell. 'Alí Kulí fled, accompanied by a few followers, and all his property and valuables fell into the hands of the Afghans. Himún, rejoiced at this victory, sent an account of his success, together with the spoils captured from the Mughals, to 'Adil Shah, who was exceedingly pleased when he received it, and looked on this first piece of good fortune as a proof that he was always destined to be victorious. He gave a great festival, and sent Himún a dress of honour, adorned with jewels and worked with gold thread, and an elephant, and made him promises of unlimited favour.

When Himin learnt the bestowal of these favours, he advanced, and after he had passed Agra, rumours reached Dehli of the coming of 'Adil Shah's troops. The Chaghatais assembled from different directions and consulted together. Tardi Muhammad Khan said, "It appears to me that it would be 'better to quit this place and join the Prince, that the never-failing good fortune of Jalalu-d din may overshadow us." Abu-l Ma'ali and the other Chaghatai nobles said, "This shows want of heart. The Afghan army has not yet arrived, and we have not been vanquished by their superior force. If we then quit Dehli, what answer shall we be able to give te-morrow before the throne?" Tardi Beg would not, however, agree with them, say what they would, and separated himself and his army from them. The other nobles prepared for action.

Himún encamped in the neighbourhood of Old Dehlí, and set forth from thence with his army ready for fighting in three divisions. The nobles of the tribe of Chaghatáí came forth from Dehlí with their valiant troops, and the blood-drinking elephants which had fallen into the prosperous hands of King Humáyún during the war with Sikandar Súr. Tardí Beg also came out with his men, and took up his post on the left. Severe fighting took place. At first the Mughals, careless of life, kept up a constant fire of arrows, and the hearts of many Afgháns were pierced through and through by their deadly points. They were on the point of flying from the field of battle, when Hímún, seeing that his affairs were getting desperate in that quarter, directed Alláh-dád Khán to go to their assistance from the left. Alláh-dád Khán, who was so brave a man that he had never turned his back to the enemy in any battle, attacked the Mughals, and for a short time kept them in check; but they again fell on him both from the left and right, wounded Alláh-dád Khán with their piercing arrows, and scattered his troops as the wind does the clouds. Tardí Beg did not leave his position to assist either party.¹

When Himin saw that the Mughals were in good spirits, and the Afghans disheartened, he advanced with his own division of 3000 cavalry, made an onslaught on the Mughals, and routed them. They were unable to rally, and as they were utterly defeated, they took to flight. Himun pursued them, and slaughtered many. The Afghans did not treat Abú-l Ma'ali with great severity, because he had a secret understanding with them. So much plunder of the Mughal army fell into Hímún's hands, that it was impossible to take an account of it-160 elephants. and 1000 horses of Arab breed, and an immense quantity of property and valuables; -Himún collected all, and kept them himself: and from obtaining possession of so many things appertaining to royalty, he began to entertain ambitious ideas, and say, "'Adil Shah is helpless. Although he possessed a valiant army, he could do nothing when Ibráhím and Sikandar rebelled. Now all his elephants and soldiers are with me." Looking on things in this light, he distributed all the spoil, with the exception of the elephants, among the Afghans who accompanied him, and gained them over to his own side. With their concurrence, he entered Dehlí, raised the Imperial canopy over him, and ordered coin to be struck in his name. He appointed governors of his own, and brought the Dehlí territory and the neighbouring parganas under his control; and in order to console the King, he sont an account of the victory in these words: "Your slave, by the royal fortune, has rented the Mughal army, which was firm as an iron wall; but I hear that Humáyún's son commands a numerous force, and is advancing against Dehlí. For this reason I have kept the horses and elophants of the Mughals, in order that I may be able to face the valiant enemy, and not allow them to reach Dehlí." 'Adil Shúh was comforted by these deceiful assertions.

When the nobles of the tribe of Chaghatai were defeated, and the royal troops retired disheartened from Dehlí, news of the defeat of the chiefs, and of the skill and bravery of the infidel, reached the high-fortuned and exalted prince. He marched without halting, with Bairam Khán, and the remainder of the nebles who accompanied him during that expedition, to Sirhind, where he showed great anger against the chiefs. Tardi Beg was punished. The treasury was opened, and gold distributed, and many people were enlisted. They then marched towards Dohlí. When they arrived at Thánesar, a consus was taken of the army, which was found to consist of 26,000 horsomen. Sháh Badágh Khán was sent on ahead with 4000, and directed to keep always one march in front of His Majesty. A halt of some days' duration was made at Thánesar. One day, during the time when accounts of Himun's vigorous measures were daily arriving, Bairam Khán took the Prince into the presence of the Kntbu-l Aktáb Saiyid Jalál Tháncsarí, and procured him the honour of kissing the feet of that most holy individual. Whon they were about to depart, they begged him to give them the assistance of his prayers. They said, "This accursed infidel is coming with an army numerous as auts and locusts; it is proper that your holiness should protect the cause of Islam." The Sniyid reflected for a short time, and then said to them, "Have you not heard what little boys at play say?" Ho then dismissed thom. On the morrow they marched to a distance of seven kos from Karnál, where they encamped. Himún, who had taken possession of the Dehli throne, being informed of the coming of the Mughal forces, went out with regal pomp from Dehlí, with the intention of fighting them. It is related, that when Himún was proceeding to Dehlí against the nobles of King Humáyún, he encamped near Old Dehli. The evening preceding the day on which he expected a battle, he went to the sanctified mausoleum of the Kutbu-l Aktáb, His Highness Kutbu-l Hakk, the polestar of religion and piety, and placing the head of entreaty on the august threshold, vowed that if he were destined to conquer Dehli,-if the throne of Dehli were granted him, and the Mughal troops put to flight,-he would become a Musulmán on his return to Dehlí, and diffuse the religion of Muhammad. The Almighty gave him victory. But he perjured himself, and did not become a Musulmán, or forsake his heathen prejudices; nay, he even persecuted the Musulmans. But at last he saw what he did see.

When he was going to fight on the field of Pánípat, the night before the battle, he beheld, in a dream, a torrent come down and carry away the elephant on which he was mounted. When he was nearly drowned, a Mughal came, east a chain round his neck, and drew him out. On awaking, he sent for the interpreters of dreams, related his to them, and asked them to explain it. The interpreters, after thinking over the business, looked at one another, and Himun inferred that there was something unpleasant in the explanation. He therefore said, "Banish fear from your minds, tell what you have discovered." interpreters said, "The torrent which you saw is the Mughal army, which comes with such force that it carries away you and the horse on which you are mounted, and the chain signifies the blood which will flow from your body when you are wounded, and cover you entirely." Himun became fearful, and said, "The very reverse of this dream will happen."

On the morrow, when he mounted to proceed to battle, heavy rain fell, and the best elephant of that infidel, which was of gigantic size, was struck in two by lightning.1 On account of this, Himún became very thoughtful, and aware that the good fortuno of the Mughals was in the ascendant, and that the victory was not for him, he was much terrified at the explanation of his dream, and set forth unwillingly to the fight. His Highness Akbar Mírzá had beforo this reached Pánípat. Hímún had encamped two kes west of that city. He had with him a force of 40,000 calvary, while the Mughal army did not exceed 20,000 horso and foot.2 The soldiers of both sides had frequent trials of strength during the space of a week. Three days before the battle Bairam Khán gave a great entertainment, and raised a large audience-tent, adorned with embroidered satin, like the flower-beds of a garden in the early spring, or Paradise itself. Ho spread carpets of various colours, and on them he placed a golden throne, and caused Prince Akbar Mirzá to sit on it; after which, the darbar was opened to the public. The nobles of the Chaghatáí tribe were made joyful by the gift of expensive dresses of honour, and regal presents, and promises of future favour were likewise made to them. Bairam Khán said, "This is the commencement of His Majesty's reign. This infidel has routed the whole royal army, and is now making preparations against us. If you do your best in this business, with one heart and soul, Hindústán is yours. I place my trust in God. If we fail in this, you, whose homes are at a distance of 500 kes, will not be able to find an asylum."

All the nobles placed their heads at the foot of the throne, and said, "If it please the Most High, we will not be found wanting in the performance of our duty as long so we have breath in our bodies." After this they said to Ahmad Beg, the madman, who was unequalled throughout the world in foretelling the future by what he saw in the blade-bone of a sheep, "Tell us by means of your art who will gain the victory." After feasting and eating he tried his art, and then, being filled with joy and gladness, said, "The victory is on our side, but one chief of rank will obtain martyrdom during the fight."

At length, after two or three days, Himún, having made ready for action, came out into the plain, and seated himself in a howda on an elephant, in order that he might be able to overlook and superintend his troops. He also caused the golden standards to be displayed. Bairam Khin also drew up the people of Chaghatái to the right and left in battle array. Shih Badágh Khin and Shih Abú-l Ma'áli, with 6000, passed to the left of Pánipat, and came to the rear of the armies. Bairam Khin placed Akbar Mírzá's own private tent in an elevated position, and left 3000 horse to guard him. He then placed his reliance in Him in whose hands all human affairs are, and on whom victory depends, and turned his attention to the battle.

Himún was excessively arrogant on account of his troops and elephants. He advanced, fought, and routed the Mughals, whose heads lay in heaps, and whose blood flowed in streams. He thus at first vanquished the Mughal army; but as the brilliancy of the star of Prince Akbar's fortune was not destined to be diminished, it chanced that, by the decree of the Almighty, an arrow struck Himún in the forchead. He told his elephant driver to take the elephant out of the field of battle. When the Afgháns saw that the animal was retreating, they believed that Himún was flying; but on approaching him they saw how matters stood, and as no benefit is ever derived from disloyalty he sustained a complete defeat. Sháh Abú-l Ma'álí, however, one of the chief nobles, obtained martyrdom on that day.

When Shah Kuli Beg was told of what had occurred, he came up to the elephant, and brought it into the presence of Bairam Khan. Bairam Khan, after prostrating himself, and returning thanks, caused Himan to descend from the elephant, after which he bound his hands, and took him before the young and fortunate Prince, and said, "As this is our first success, let Your Highness's own august hand smite this infidel with the sword." The Prince, accordingly, struck him, and divided his head from his unclean body (Nov. 5, A.D. 1556).1

(Muhammad Shah 'Adil was slain in the year 964 A.H.,2 in an action with Khizr Khan, the son of Muhammad Khan Gauria. His body, which was not yet quite dead, was, at his conqueror's command, fastened to the foot of an elephant, and dragged about. His miserable reign lasted about three years.)

¹ Here Ahmad Yadgar concludes his history, and, with characteristic negligence, omits to mention a word about the fate of 'Adali, upon whose reign he has just been engaged. The Tartkh-i Ddúdi and many other histories say the young Prince declined to commit this wanton act of brutality, and his subsequent actions render this highly probable. Firishta says, that at Bairam Khūn's importunity, he merely touched the head of the captive with the sword, by which he became entitled to the appellation of "Ghdzi."

MAKHZAN-I AFGHANI'

AND

NI'AMATU-LLA.

[The Makhsan-i Afghání and the Táríkh-i Khán-Jahán Lodi are frequently mentioned and referred to as separate works, but they are essentially one and the same. The Tárikh contains, in addition, a memoir of Khán-Jahán Lodí, from which the book takes it name, and it also gives a meagre history of the life of Jahángír; but in other respects it may be considered as only a revised version of the Makhsan. It is fuller than the latter in some parts, especially in the lives of the saints, but still the notes in the following Extracts will show that, although it is generally better, it is occasionally inferior to the Makhsan.

The author of the work was Ni'amatu-lla, who held the office of waki'-nawis or historiographer at the Court of Jahángír; and he tells us that his father, Khwája Habíbu-lla, of Hirát, passed thirty-five years in the service of Akbar. But Ni'amatu-lla, though he had the chief hand in the work, was assisted or perhaps even directed by Haibat Khán, of Sámána. Ni'amatu-lla, after stating in the preface to the Makhzan, that he undertook the work in the year 1018, "at the command of Nawáb

The Nawab Khan-Jahan Lodi, one of the most illustrious generals of Jahan. He rebelled in the reign of Shah Jahan, and was slain by the Imperial trops 1631.—See Vol. IV. of this work, p. 537, and Blochmann's Ain-i Akhari, p. 537.

Khán-Jahán Lodí," goes on to say that, "supported by the amiable kindness of Haibat Khán bin Salím Khán of Sámána, one of Khán-Jahán's attendants, who collected and arranged the scattered and confused genealogy of the Afgháns," he wrote the "history in accordance with the labours and researches of the said Haibat Khán." At the end of the MS, of the Tárikh-i Khán-Jahán Lodi, Ni'amatu-lla informs us that he finished the work at the city of Burhánpúr, and a few lines later it is stated that "there remain some words to be added on the genealogy of the most humble and most abject of slaves, Haibat Khán, who is occupied in writing and verifying this work." The pedigree and history of his family are then related at some length. The terms of humility accompanying the name indicate that they were written by Haibat Khán himself. The authorship of the work is thus distinctly asserted both by Ni'amatu-lla and Haibat Khán; and strange to say, there has appeared to be yet another claimant. At the end of the second or Historical part of the Makhsan, there is found in the various MSS, the following passage, which the Editor of this work translates afresh, as Dorn's version is not satisfactory: "The original author of this Tarikh-i Sher Shahi is 'Abbás Sarwání.' But as this work is deficient in some particulars, such as the affairs of Báz Bahádur, the memoirs of the Kiránís and Lohánís, and in some other matters, the history was incomplete: So in these days the humble servant Ibráhím Batní has made extracts from the Türikh-i Nizami, which also contains the history of Sher Shah and Islam Shah, and he has selected sundry matters from the Makhsan-i Afgháni, written by Ni'amatu-lla, and having introduced them into this history, has unade it complete." These words are evidently applicable to some amended version of the Tarikh-i Sher Shahi, not, as Dorn supposed, to the Makhsan-i Afghani; for the most bare-faced

Dorn's rendering is, "The original of this history is the Türikh-i Sher Shahi, of 'Abbas Sarwani;" but the Persian words are plagiarist and book-maker would hardly assert that he had improved and completed a work by adding to it selections from its own pages. It is curious to find such an entry in all the known MSS. of the Makhsan; for the only way of accounting for it is by supposing that it was inserted by mistake in the Makhsan, instead of the work for which it was intended; and if this be so, all the known MSS. of the work must have been derived from the copy in which the false entry was made.

The work begins with Adam, and professes to trace the origin of the Afghans; but says Sir H. Elliot, "Nothing can be more meagre than the whole of the introductory book about the settlement of the Afghans in Ghor. It is nothing but a rifacciamento of the childish Muhammadan stories of the Creation and of the prophets, especially Israel and Saul, all of which, as well as the early Muhammadan history, is taken from the commonest sources, without a single independent statement to encourage the least notion of correctness, research, novelty or probability. The Tárikh-i Khán-Jahán Lodi is nearly verbatim the same, and offers no differences of the least consequence. a history of the early days of the Afghans, it is utterly untrustworthy, and should by no means be considered as the basis of the annals of a nation of which we remain as ignorant as if the work had never been written." The following Extracts are taken from the second or Historical part of the work. The third part contains memoirs of sixty-eight Afghán saints.

The second book is valuable as the work of one who lived near the times of which he writes, and had a special interest in the subject. The work was finished in the year 1021 H. (1612 A.D.). Dorn observes, "Ni'amatu-lla was contemporary with Firishta, and commenced the history of the Afgháns in the same year when Firishta finished his work; but he is nowhere mentioned. The identity of the sources they used in compiling their respective works is evident, from the extreme, often verbal coincidence of the style and thread of the history of the reigns of the Lodí race and the family of Sher Sháh.

The following is Sir H. Elliet's analysis of the MS:-"In tho history of Sher Sháh tho Tárikh-i Khán-Jahán Lodi is of about the same longth as the Makhzan-i Afgháni. The only additions are two long oulogies of Khawas Khan and Haji Khán, and some of the regulations of Sher Sháh, which are added at the end of the reign. It follows the same order as tho Makhsan, but varies from it considerably, and is altogether In this reign he quotes the Tarikh-i Sher Shahi, Táríkh-i Nizámi, Ma'dan-i Akbar, and Akbar-náma, and appears to be in doubt as to which should be followed, for he is contradictory in somo parts. The history of Islam Shah follows, or oxactly resembles, Dáúdí, and is not in the least like the Makhzan. The reign of 'Adalí is identically the same as the Makhzan; so are the notices of Shujáwal, Báz Bahádur, and Táj and Imád Kirání. On the subsequent periods of Afghán dominion in the East the history is brought lower down, and gives an account of Daud of Bengal, and a full history of tho proceedings to the year 1021. The account of the saints does not occupy quite the same position. It is pretty nearly verbatim the same; but somo lives differ, as Kliwaja Yaliya Kabu, which is longor. While some of the Makhzan has been omitted, other matter equally absurd and childish has been introduced. Almost all the additions given by Dorn, from Dr. Lees' copy, in his notes, are to be found in my copy, and show that the two are identical. Both contain the life of Jahángír.

"The Makhsan-i Afgháni has been well and faithfully translated by Dorn; and in my translations I have almost copied verbatim from him."

The author mentions in his Preface the following authors who "have writton books lately on the history of Sultán Bahlol Lodí," viz. Khwája Nízámu-d dín Ahmad, in the Tárikh-i Nizámi; Shaikh 'Abbás Sarwání, in the Tárikh-i Sher Sháhi; Mauláná Mushtákí, in his Tárikh (called the Wáki'át-i Mushtákí); Mauláná Mahmád bin Ibráhím Kálwání, in the history of Sultán Ibráhím, and named Ibráhím Sháhi.

The Extracts relating to the reign of Sultan Bahlol were translated by "Ensign" Charles F. Mackenzie; the others are from the pen of Sir H. M. Elliot himself.

These works, relating to the Afghan dynasties, come a little ont of their chronological order; but it was not desirable to postpone them to the reign of Akbar for the mere sake of maintaining the chronological sequence of the authors.

EXTRACTS.

The reign of Sultan Bahlol.

It is narrated by the author of the Tárikh-i Ibráhim Sháhi, and by the historian Nizami, that Malik Bahlol Lodi was the nephew of Sultán Sháh Lodí, who bore the title of Islám Khán during the time of Sultán Mubárak Sháh and Saiyid Khizr Khán, and was one of the grandees of that period. He held the pargana of Sirhind in jágír, and governed the neighbouring districts. [Malik Bahlol, son of Malik Kálá, was his full nephew, and] when he perceived that his nephew possessed discernment and good sense, he treated him as his son, and constituted him his successor fand caused his own turban to be bound on his nephew's head.]1 After the decease of Islam Khan, Balilol became governor of Sirhind, and established his authority firmly. Kuth Khán, the son of Islám Khán, declining to acknowledge the authority of Bahlol, went to Sultan Muhammad, who was then King of Dehli, and complained against Malik Bahlol. consequence of his representations, Hisám Khán, who was called Hájí Shudaní, one of the dependents of the Saiyid dynasty of Dehli, who had attained the rank of a noble, was despatched by Sultán Muhammad with a numerous army against Malik Bahlol.² Both parties met near the village of Karra, in the pargana of Khizrábád, and a fierce battle took place. Hisám Khán, being defeated, retreated to Dehlí, whilst Malik Bahlol's power and authority were greatly increased.

It is related, that during the time he was with his uncle Islám Khán, he went once to Sámána for the purpose of transacting some urgent and important business, taking with him two of his intimate friends, and hearing that there was a holy man named Saiyid ibn Májzub in that place, who made predictions (sáhib i lafz búd), 1 Malik Bahlol went to see that darwesh, accompanied by his two friends, and, after having treated him with every courtesy, sat down. That person, who was abstracted from worldly thoughts, asked, "if any one of them was able to buy the kingdom of Dehlí from him for 2000 tankas." Malik Bahlol had 1300 tankas in his purse, which he took out and placed before the saint, and said, "This is all I possess."2 That worthy person consented to accept the sum so proffered, and said, "May the empire of Dehlí be fortunate to you!" When his two associates began to ridicule his superstition, the Malik said, "One of two things must happen: if the event be successful, I shall have made a good bargain; if not, in the day of judgment there are rewards for good deeds done to darweshes." It is said in certain histories that Malik Bahlol traded; but the truth or falsehood of this has never been clearly ascertained. It is known that his grandfather and father were merchants, and were in the habit of visiting Hind.4

Malik Bahlol, after the death of Islam Khan, gained possession of the territories of Sirhind [and the Panjab] 5 by the assistance of his other uncle Malik Fíroz, the brother of Islám Khán, aided by the whole of his kindred, and strengthened himself and established his authority. The speech which Shaikh ibn Majzúb had made to him in his early youth caused him to aspire to the throne, and he was desirons of bringing the bird of empire into his net. After vangnishing Hisam Khan, Malik Bahlol wrote a letter to Sultan Muhammad, complaining of the mal-administration and depravity of Hisám Khán, and lauding his own candour and sincority. Ho stated also in it that he would obey and serve His Majesty, if the wizarat were taken away from Hájí Hisám Khán,1 and given to Hamíd Khan. Sultán Muhammad, who was totally inexperienced, believing what Malik Bahlol said to be true, put his guiltless and faithful servant Hájí Hisám Khán to death on the following day, and raised Hamid Khan to the rank of chief minister. Malik Bahlel and the whole of the Lodis, when they heard this news, came forward without hesitation, and having paid their respects to the Sultán, were confirmed in the possession of their jágirs.

After this reconciliation, Malik Bahlol made war, in the name of Sultán Muhammad, against Sultán Mahmúd Khiljí of Malwa, [who was ruling over Hisár Fírozah, Hánsí, and Nágor,]², and overcame him. Upon which the Sultán ennobled him by giving him the title of Khán-khánán. Thus the Lodís became gradually more powerful, and possessed themselves by force, without King Muhammad's consent, of Lahore, Dípálpúr, Sannám, Hisár Fírozah, and various other parganas, and paid no attention to what Sultán Muhammad wrote to thom in remonstrance. They raised the standards of rebellion, collected a force, and went against Sultán Muhammad who was in Dohlí, and besieged that place; but failing in their attempt, they returned to Sirhind, where Malik Bahlol assumed the title of Sultán, but abstained from having the khutba read and coinage struck in his name until Dehlí should fall into his hands.

About this time Sultán Muhammad died, and the nobles and chief men of the State placed his son, Sultán 'Aláu-d dín, on the throne. The whole of Hind was divided into provinces governed by petty rulers (mulik-i tawa'if); but the Lodis predominated. Ahmad Khán Mewáttí possessed the country from Mahraulí to Ladhú Saráí, near the city of Dehlí. The Lodís held the country of Sirhind, Lahore, Sámána, Sannám, and Hisár, as far as Pánípat.1 Darvá Khán Lodí governed the territory of Sambhal, up to the ferry of Khwaja Khizr, which adjoins Dehlí.2 'I'sá Khán Turk-bacha held Kol and Jalálí. Kuth Khán, the son of Hasan Khán the Afghán, was governor of Rápri.3 And Rái Partáb held the towns of Bhúigánw, Pattiálí, and Kampil. Bayána was in the hands of Dáúd Khán Auhadí; and Sultán 'Aláu-d dín rnled only in the city of Dehlí, and a few of the neighbouring villages.4 There were also · kings in Gujarát, the Dekhin, Málwá, Jaunpúr, [Mándú],5 and Bengál.6

Sultán Bahlol, collecting an army for the second time, marched from Sirhind to Dehlí; but as he could not succeed in capturing the fort of Dehlí, he again returned to Sirhind. At this time, Sultán 'Aláu-d dín consulted Kuth Khán Lodí and Ráí Partáb, on the means of strengthening himself, to which they replied, "If the Sultan will degrade Hamid Khan from the rank of cazir, and imprison him, we will wrest some parganas from the hands of the nobles, and make them over to the exchequer. Accordingly, Sultan 'Alan-d din ordered Hamid Khan to be confined, and then marched from Dehlí to Burhánábád, and eneamped near Amroha. Kuth Khán, 'Isá Khán, and Partáb came there to pay their respects, and promised to make over forty parganas to the Sultan, on condition that he would put Hamid Khán to death. Partáb incited the Sultán to slay Hamid Khán, because the Khán's father in former days had plundered his estate and seized his wife. Sultán 'Aláu-d dín, who was unfit to govern a kingdom, gave directions, without thought or reflection, for the execution of Hamid Khán, whose brothers, learning these intentions, managed to liberate him from confinement, and then fled to Dehli. Malik Muhammad Jamál, in whose custody he had been, pursued Hamíd Khán to his honse and attacked him; but in the tumult he was killed by a spear, and many people joined the party of Hamid Khán. The wazir removed the wives, sons, and daughters of the Sultán, exposed and bare-headed, out of the fort of Dehli, and then took possession of the treasures and regalia. Sultán 'Aláu-d din's irresolution hindered him from doing anything, and after putting off his revenge from day to day, he remained in Badáún on account of the rainy season. Hamíd Khán resolved to avail himself of the opportunity, and to establish another sovereign in the room of Sultán 'Aláu-d dín; but as Sultán Mahmúd, King of Jaunpur, was connected with Sultan 'Alau-d din, and Sultan Mahmúd, King of Mándú, was too distant to admit of his holding communication with him, he did not think proper to make any determined move. Whilst he was meditating on his future schemes, Bahlol, having received intelligence of what was in contemplation, came with his entire army from Sirhind to Dehlí. Hamíd Khán did not quit his post, as he considered himself sufficiently strong to prevent Sultán Bahlol from entering the city. After entering into a convention, Sultan Bahlol gained permission to enter the city, and he, in order to meet the necessities of the times, treated Hamid Khan with all possible politeness and courtesy, and went daily to visit him, at the same time always keeping near his own person many Afghans who had joined him from Roh. His determination was to make himself king, and turn Hamid Khan out.

One day Hamíd Khán gave a grand entertainment, and invited many nobles as his guests. Sultán Bahlol, who was one of the party, had instructed his Afghans to behave in a foolish and indecorous mannuer, during Hamíd Khán's feast, so that he might look on them as a set of idiots, and ceasing to regard them with any apprehension, might pay no further attention to them. When the Afghans went into Hamid Khan's presence, they acted in an unusual and strange manner. Some fastened their shoes to their girdles, some placed their shoes in the recess above Hamid Khán's head. Hamid Khán inquired what this meant. They answered, "We are taking precautions against thieves." After a short time the Afghans said to Hamíd Khán, "Your carpet is wonderfully coloured; if you give us each a blanket from it, we will send it as a rarity to our native land of Roh, to make caps for our children, that the inhabitants of the world may know that we are in the service of Hamid Khan, and are treated with much dignity, honour, and respect." Hamíd Khán smiled, and said in reply, "I will make you presents of the most costly articles for rarities." And as they were bringing round trays containing perfumes, the Afghans licked the scent bottles, and ate the flowers. They opened the leaves which covered the pan. First they ate the lime, and when this had heated their mouths, they chewed the pán afterwards, and in other respects conducted themselves in an extraordinary manner. Hamíd Khán asked Malik Bahlol, "Why do they act thus?" He replied, "They are a set of downs, and have associated but little with men; they only know now to eat and die." It became Bahlol's custom to bring some of these men whenever he went to see Hamid Khán; but the reater portion of his attendants remained standing without. On one occasion, when Hamid Khan was feasting Malik Bahlol, he Afghans, in obedience to secret instructions received from Malik Bahlol, beat the door-keepers, and forced their way in, saying, "We are likewise servants of Hamíd Khán; why should we be prevented from coming to salute him?" When a tumult and disturbance had arisen, Hamíd Khán asked the reason of it. They, as they were entering, abused Malik Bahlol, and said to the minister, "We are just as much your servants as ho is; ho comes in, and why sheuld not we?" When Hamid Khán directed that they should be admitted, the Afghans crowded in, and two of them placed themselves near every servant of Hamid Khán. When the eating part of the entertainment was over, and many of Hamíd Khán's men had gene out, Kuth Khán Lodí drew forth a chain from his bosem, and laid it before Hamíd Khán, saying, "The best thing for yen will be to retire from public life for a shert time. As I have caten your salt, I do not intend to put you to death." After this he caused Hamíd Khán to be seized, and gave him in charge to his officers.1

Thus Malik Bahlol took possession of Dehli, without hindrance or opposition; and on the 17th of the month Rabinal awwal, A.H. 855² (19th April, 1451), at the presperous moment and auspicious time which the astrologers learned in the stars, and experienced Bráhmans had indicated, he seated himself on the Imperial throne, and ordered the khutha to be read and coin to be struck in his own name. He assumed the title of Sultán Bahlol; and did'his best to conciliate the nebles and soldiery, and gain the goodwill of great and small, by his extreme liberality and generosity. He won the people over to his side, and when he had secured a firm hold on Dehli, after some days, he wrote to Sultán 'Aláu-d dín, saying, "Since I was educated by your father, and consider myself as in fact your regent for this country, I will allow the royal power, which had left your hands, to remain as it was; and I will not prevent the khutba from being read in your name." Sultán 'Aláu-d dín wrote in reply, "As my father looked on you as his offspring, I likewise have looked on you as my elder brother, and have therefore made over the government to vou, and contented myself with Badáún."1 Sultán Bahlol, being successful and prosperous, ruled the empire with vigour. He wrested the parganas bordering on Dehli from the people who had usurped them, and took them into his own possession. He also, in the first year of his reign, went to settle the province of Multán.

Some of Sultán 'Aláu-d dín's nobles, who were dissatisfied with the government of the Lodís, wrote to Sultán Mahmúd of Jaunpúr, and summoned him to their assistance. Accordingly, in the year 855,2 he advanced from Jaunpúr to Dehlí, which place he besieged. Khwája Báyazíd, the son of Sultán Bahlol, with other nobles, remained there to garrison the fort.3 Sultán Bahlol,2 on hearing this, lest Dípálpúr and came and encamped in the village of Narela, fifteen kos distant from Dehlí. In spite of all his endeavours to make peace, Sultán Mahmúd's pride and arrogance prevented an accommodation. Sultán Mahmúd sent Fath Khán Hirwí, with 30,000 horsemen and 39 elephants, against Sultán Bahlol. These came into action in three divisions. The leading elephant of Fath Khán's army was disabled by Kuth Khán Lodi, who was an unrivalled archer, with a single shot. Daryá Khán Lodi, who had joined Sultán Mahmúd, was fighting in the samo field. Kuth Khán called out to him with a lond voice, "Your mother and sisters are in the fort; it is not fit that you should do battle for the stranger, and lose sight of the reputation of your family." Daryá Khán said, "I will leave the field, provided you do not follow me." Kuth took an eath that he would not pursue him; and thus, on account of Daryá Khán's retreat, Fath Khán's troops were defeated, and he himself was taken prisoner. Sultán Mahmúd, being thus foiled, and being unable to effect anything, retired to Jampúr.

Sultan Bahlel then settled himself firmly, and increased his dominious and authority. He took measures to gain entire possession of the country; and with this object in view, first proceeded into Mewat. Ahmad Khan Mewatti submitted; upon which the Sultan deprived him of seven parganas, but allowed him to retain the remainder. Ahmad appointed his nucle, Mubarak Khan, to be perpetually in attendance at Court. The Sultán proceeded from Mewát to Baran. Daryú Khán Lodí, governor of Sambhal, also came before His Majesty, to tender his allegiance and submission, and presented him with seven parganas. The Sultan went thence to Kol, and confirmed Isa Khán in the possession of that place on the former terms. When he reached Burhánábád, Mubárak Khán, governor of Sakít, came to pay his respects; he was likewiso confirmed in the possession of the districts which he held in jágir. Rái Partáb, chief of the zamindars in those parts, was also confirmed in possession of Bliffinganw. From thence he went to the fort of Rapri.1 Kuth Khan, the son of Husain, who commanded in Rupri, resisted, but his fort was speedily captured. Khan Jahán, after making a solemn promise of safe conduct to Kutb Khán, brought him into the King's presence, when he also was confirmed in his júgirs. From thence, Sultán Bahlol went to Etáwah, the governor of which likewise offered his homage.

At this period Mahmud Sharki, by the advice of Malika Jahan, who was the chief lady of his harem, and was related to Sultán 'Aláu-d dín, again assembled a force, and came against Sultán Bahlol, and encamped in the country about Etáwah. On the first day, both armies engaged in hostilities; on the second, Kuth Khán and Rái Partáb made amicable arrangements, and agreed that the whole of the territory which had belonged to Mubárak Sháh, King of Dehlí, should be left in the hands of Sultan Bahlol, and that which Sultan Ibrahim, King of Jaunpur, had held, should be left in the possession of Sultan Mahmud; also that seven elephants which had fallen into the hands of Sultán Bahlol in the fight with Fath Kháu should be given back to Sultán Mahmúd. Shamsábád was to be considered the property of Sultan Bahlol, and was to be made over to him by Juna Khan, the agent of Sultan Mahmud. After this truce, Sultán Mahmúd returned to Jauupúr, and Sultán Bahlol wrote a farmán at the appointed timo to Júná Khán, directing him to leave Shamsábád, and give it into the hands of Ráí Karan. As Júná Khán resisted the execution of the order, Sultán Bahlol went in person to Shamsábád, took the fort and town from Júná Khán and gave them to Rái Karan.

Sultán Mahmúd, when informed of these transactions, again went against Sultán Bahlol, in violation of his solemn engagements. They met face to face at Shamsábád, and Daryá Khán Lodí and Kutb Khán made a night attack on the army of Sultán Mahmúd. By chance, Kutb Khán's horse stumbled, and he was thrown to the ground and taken prisoner. Sultán Mahmúd confined him and sent him to Jaunpúr, where he remained captive for seven years. Sultán Bahlol, leaving Prince Jalál Khán, Sikandar Khán, and 'Imádu-l Mulk in front of Sultán Mahmúd's forces, for the purpose of rendering assistance to Ráí Karan, who was in the fort of Shamsábád, went in person against Sultán Mahmúd. At this time the Sultán [Mahmúd] fell sick, and in two or three days the measure of his age was filled to the brim, and he ceased to exist. His mother, Bíbí Rájí, who was a very wise, clever and experienced woman, with the assistance of the nobles, seated Prince Bhíkhan Khán on the throne of the kingdom, and gave him the title of Muhammad Sháh. Certain of the chief nobles and grandees of the State interposed, and made peace between the two monarchs, under which it was agreed that the territories of Sultán Mahmúd should be ruled by Muhammad Sháh, and that those owned formerly by Sultán 'Aláu-d dín should be governed by Sultán Bahlol.

After this compact, Muhammad Shah retraced his steps to Jaunpur, and Sultan Bahlol went towards Dehli. On his arrival near Dehlí, Shams Khátún, sister of Kuth Khán, and the chief lady of the Sultan's harem, sent to say, that as long as Kutb Khán remained the prisoner of Sultán Muhammad Sháh, it would be unlawful for the Sultan to take sleep or repose of any kind, [adding that she would kill herself].1 This speech made such an impression on the Sultán, that he turned back from Dehlí, and set off again against Muhammad Sháh. When Muhammad heard this, he set out from Jaunpur, with the view of meeting Sultán Bahlol; and on reaching Shamsábád, he took that district away from Rái Karan, Sultán Bahlol's governor, and reinstated Júná Khán. Although Rái Partáb had formerly been on the side of Sultan Bahlol, yet he now became alarmed on account of Muhammad Shah's successes, and joined his party. Muhammad Sháh reached Sursení by uninterrupted marches. Sultán Bahlol encamped in the pargana of Ráprí, which adjoined Sursení, and fighting took place for some days between the two armies.

Muhammad Sháh wrote a farmán to the Kotwál of Jaunpúr, ordering him to put his (the Sháh's) own brother, Hasan Khán, and Kuth Khán Lodí, who were both detained as prisoners, to death.1 The Kotwal represented that Bibi Raji protected both of them, and that he had not sufficient authority to kill them. When Muhammad Sháh learnt the contents of the reply, he wrote in a perfidious, plausible and treacherous way to his mother, saying, "My brother, Hasan Khán, suffers greatly in prison; it is proper that you should come here and make peace between him and me; after which an estate shall be given to him." Bíbí Rájí set forth on receiving the letter; and when she was some stages on the road, one of Shah Muhammad's courtiers put Prince Hasan Khán to death by order. This news reached Bíbí Rájí at Kanauj. After mourning for Hasan Khán in Kanauj, she declined to enter the presence of Muhammad Sháh. When Muhammad Sháh heard of his mother's return, he was wroth, and wrote to her, saying, "Why do you mourn on account of the execution of an individual? All the princes will meet with a like fate, and then you can mourn for them all at once!" The nobles and ministers were in continual dread of Muhammad Sháh, for he was of a very ferocious, bloodthirsty, and passionate disposition.

During these transactions, Husain Khán, a younger brother of Muhammad Sháh, sent Sultán Sháh and Jalál Khán Ajodhaní to inform Muhammad Sháh that the troops of Sultán Bahlol intended to make a night attack; that 30,000 horsemen and thirty elephants had been detached for the purpose, and had taken a position on the banks of the Jharna.² Sultán Muhammad,³

In the Türikh-i Ddüdi (MS. p. 25) they are called two sons of Sultan Shah, by name Hasan Khan and Kuth Khan. The insertion of "Lodi" must be an error, though his father's name also was Sultan Shah. These princes were evidently of the Jaunpar family, and Sultan Shah himself appears as one of the conspirator-against Muhammad Shah. [Still, Kuth Khan Lodi was a prisoner in Jaunpar at this time.]

on receiving this news, sent a division of his troops to oppose them. Princo Husain Khán desired to take his brother Sháhzáda Jalál Khán with him, and sent a man to call him; but Sultán Sháh remonstrated against the delay, representing that Jalál Khán might como up afterwards. Upon this, they went off in the direction of the enemy. It so happened, that Sultan Balilol's army was prepared for these movements; so that when Princo Jalál Khán, in obedience to the summons of Husain Khán, had left the army of Muhammad Sháh, and started for the Jharna, ho found himself in the presence of the Sultán's troops, instead of Husain Khán's. Thereupon, Sultán Bahlol's men seized Jalál Khán, and brought him into the presence of their sovereign, who imprisoned him, determining to retain him as a hostage for the safety of Kuth Khán. [Husain Khán, when he heard of this capture of Jalál Khán, being in fear and dread of Muhammad Shah, took to flight and went to Jaunpúr.]1 Muhammad Sháh was terror-stricken when he learnt the capture of one brother and the flight of another, fearing that the latter might go and do damage to his interests throughout the country; but being unable to offer any opposition, he went to Kanauj, and was pursued as far as the Ganges by Sultán Bahlol, who returned to Dehlí after plundering a small portion of the baggage [and capturing some elephants and horses].

Sháhzáda Husain Khán, in the year 857, came, at Jaunpúr, into the presence of Bíbí Rájí, to pay his respects; and as she was greatly displeased with Muhammad Sháh, she, with the aid of the Sharkí nobles and grandees, raised him to the throne of the kingdom of Jaunpúr, with the title of Sultán Husain. Malik Mubárak Gang, Malik Alí Gujarátí, and other chiefs were appointed to attack Muhammad Sháh, who had taken up a position at Rájgarh, on the river Ganges. When Sultan Husain's army approached, divers nobles who were dissatisfied with Muhammad Shah forsook him, and joined the forces of Sultan Husain. Muhammad Shah fled, accompanied by 100 of his body-guard, and arrived at a garden which was in that neighbourhood, where he was surrounded by the Sultán's soldiers. Muhammad Sháh, being a capital archer, took up his bow and arrows; but previous to this, Bibi Ráji had persnaded the armourer of Muhammad to remove the points from the arrows which he had in his quiver, so he found, at the time of action, that all the arrows which he drow forth from his quiver were pointless. At last he threw down his bow, and took to his sword, with which he smote down several persons; but an arrow from the bow of destiny was sent by the hand of Malik Mubárak Gang, which struck Muhammad Sháh in the threat. The wound caused him to fall from his horse to the ground, when he attained martyrdom.

"Our mother, Nature, never here a son whom she did not slay! Beware, distrust the love of this murderer of her offspring!"

After these events, the Almighty established Sultán Husain firmly in the possession of the kingdom. He made peace with Sultán Bahlol, by which they were both bound to remain satisfied with their own possessions for four years. Rái Partáb was induced by Kutb Khán to side with Sultán Bahlol. When Sultán Husain had made peace, and arrived near the Hauz-i Hariya, he sent for Kutb Khán [Lodí] from Jaunpúr, and after presenting him with a horse, a royal dress of honour, an elephant, girdles, daggers, and jowelled swords, he gave him leave to depart, and having thus treated him with all possible honour and respect, sent him to Sultán Bahlol. Sultán Bahlol, likewise, gratified Prince Jalál Khán by the kind and polite manner in which he behaved to him, and then sent him to Sultán Husain.

Some time after, Sultán [Bahlol] determined to go to Shamsábád; which place he again took from Júná Khán, and gave it to Rái Karan. He also presented the kettle-drum and standard which he had wrested from Daryá Khán to Narsing Deo, the son of Rái Partáb. Daryá Khán took advantage of an opportunity, and, with the approval of Kuth Khán, slew Narsing Deo. Kuth Khán, Husain Khán, Mubáriz Khán, and Ráí Partáb, having entered into a conspiracy, went over to the Sharkí monarch.2 Sultán Bahlol, finding himself too weak to resist them, went back to Dehli; and after some time, started for Multán, with the intention of putting an end to the disturbances in the Panjab. He left Kuth Khán Lodí and Khán Jahán in Dehlí, to act as his deputies during his absence; but whilst he was yet on the road,3 news reached him that Sultán Husain, with a well-appointed army and war-elephants, was marching towards Dehlí. Sultán Bahlol turned back, and with all possible speed returned to Dehli, and went out to meet the foe, with whom, after some time, he found himself face to face. Continual fighting took place between the two parties during the space of seven days, when at length, after much slaughter, by the efforts of the chiefs, a peace was brought about; and it was agreed that both kings should remain within the boundaries of their respective territories for three years.

After this truce, Sultán Bahlol abode in Dehlí for three years, and Sultán Husain returned to Jaunpúr, and attended to the affairs of his kingdom and army. During this period, Sultán Bahlol proceeded against Ahmad Khán Mewáttí, who had before been an ally of Sultán Husain. When he arrived in Mewát, Ahmad Khán was induced by the representations of the Khán-khánán, one of the chief nobles of Sultán Bahlol, to come in and pay his respects.

² Ni'amatu-lla represents that this conspiracy arose in consequence of the assassination of Narsing Deo (MS., p. 87; Dorn, p. 51); but there seems no connexion. [No mention is made of "Kutb Khán" in any of the MSS. of the Makhzan.]

^{3 [&}quot;Before he reached Lahore."—Makhzan.]

About this period Ahmad Khán, the son of Yúsuf Khán Jalwání, governor of Bayána, broke out into revolt against Sultán Bahlol; and having caused the khutba to be read and coin to be struck in the fort of Bayána in the name of Sultán Husain, sent intelligence of this to Sultán Husain. No dispute had occurred during the period of the three years' truce; but now the Sultán marched towards Dehlí with 100,000 horse and 1000 elephants. Sultán Bahlol came out of Dehlí, and drew up his forces before the enemy in the neighbourhood of Bhatwára. Khán Jahán interposed, and effected a reconciliation between the parties; after which Sultán Husain went to Etáwah, and remained there, whilst Sultán Bahlol returned to Dehlí.

After the lapse of some time, Sultán Husain broke his oath, and again advanced against Sultan Bahlol. Sultan Bahlol left Dehlí, and both sides skirmished during several days in the vicinity of the Saráí Lashkar; they, however, ended by making peace. About this time Sultán Husain's mother, Bíbí Rájí, departed this life in Etáwah. Kalyán Mal, the son of Rái Karan Sing, Rájá of Gwálior, and Kuth Khán Lodí, went from Chandawar to condole with Sultan Husain. Kuth Khan found that Sultán Husain was inimical to and disposed to injure Sultán Bahlol, so he flattered the Sultan by telling him that Bahlol was his subject, and unable to cope with him as a rival, and that he would take no rest until he had obtained possession of Dehlí for him. After thus deceiving Sultán Husain, Kutb Khán took leave of him, and presented himself to Sultán Bahlol, and said, "We have escaped from the hands of Sultan Husain by wiles and contrivances, and have discovered that he entertains a rooted hatred to you. It is necessary for you, therefore, to look to yourself. Be on the alert."

About this time, Sultán 'Aláu-d dín departed to the mercy of God in Badáún. Sultán Husain went there for the purpose of offering condolence, but he finished by wresting Badáún from 'Aláu-d dín's son, and in doing so injured his reputation. From thence he went to Sambhal, where he confined Mubárak Khán, the son of Tátár Khán, the governor of that place, and sent him to Sáran. He then proceeded in person against Dehlí, with a large army and 1000 elephants, and arrived at the ferry of Kanjlı, on the river Jumna, in the month of Zi-l hijja, A.H. 893, and encamped there. Sultán Bahlol was, at this period, in the direction of Sirhind, but came to Dehlí when he heard the news. Both parties were employed in fighting for some time, and the eastern forces were generally victorious, owing to their superior strength and numbers. In the end, Kuth Khán sent a person to Sultán Husain with a message, saying, "I am the grateful servant of Bibi Ráji; she treated me with the utmost kindness when I was a prisoner in Jaunpur. I think that the most advisable course to pursue at present is to make peace, and return. Let the countries on the other side of the river Ganges be ruled by you, and those on this side by Sultán Bahlol." Thus did Kuth Khán's interposition put an end to this warfare.

Sultán Husain, relying on the truce which had been concluded, marched away, leaving his baggage behind. Sultán Bahlol took advantage of the opportunity, pursued Sultán Husain, and plundered his baggage. A portion of the valuables and treasures, which had been laden on horses and elephants, fell into the hands of Sultán Bahlol. Moreover, forty noblemen of Sultán Husain's army, who were grandees of his kingdom, including Katlagh Khán, the wasir, who was one of the most learned men of the age, Odhú, the náib, and others like them, were made captive. Sultán Bahlol put Katlagh Khán in chains, and gave him in charge to Kutb Khán. The defeated Sultán himself also fled; Malika Jahán, the chief wife of Sultán Husain, was taken prisoner. Sultán Bahlol appointed eunuchs to keep strict guard over the wife of the Sultan; and after some time she was sent, with the greatest honour and respect, to Sultán Husain. Sultán Bahlol seized several parganas which belonged to Sultán Husain, such as Kampil, Pattiálí, Sakít, Kol, and Jalálí, and appointed his own governors. He then went himself in pursuit, and when the pursuit had lasted some time, Sultán Husain faced about, and posted himself in the village of Rámpanjwáran, which is attached to Ráprí. At length, a truce was agreed upon, the conditions of which were that both the Sultáns should remain contented with their old boundaries. After the conclusion of peace, both returned to their respective countries.²

In the next year Sultán Husain, at the instigation of Malika Jahán, forgetful of his oath, again came to attack Sultán Bahlol, at the head of a large army. A desperate battle was fought, near the village of Sonhár, and Sultán Husain, being again routed, went to Ráprí. Sultán Bahlol pitched his camp near the village of Dhúpámú. An immense amount of valuable property fell into the hands of the Lodís, the possession of which tended much to increase the power and authority of Malik Bahlol.

About this time intelligence arrived of the decease of Khan Jahán Lodí, and Sultán Bahlol granted to his son the title of Khán Jahán, and conferred on him the appointments held by his father. He then went to Ráprí against Sultán Husain, and was victorious, after much fighting and slaughter. Sultán Husain, being defeated, fled across the river Jumna. Whilst passing that stream, several of his wives and children were drowned in the river of mortality; this caused Sultán Husain excessive pain and affliction. He, after suffering much trouble, and repentance, went off towards Gwálior, intending to proceed from thence to Jaunpur. On his way to Gwalior, tho Bhadauryas attacked his camp. When he arrived at that place, Ráí Karan Sing, the Rájá of Gwálior, showed his allegiance, and received him with regal honours. He presented an offering to the Sultán, consisting of some lacs of tankas, various descriptions of tents, with some horses, elephants, and camels, and thus proved himself one of the well-wishers of the State. Ho also sent a body of his own troops to accompany the Sultán as far as Kúlpi.

Whilst this was happening, Sultan Bahlol determined to proceed to Etáwah. Ibráhím Khán, the brother of Sultán Husain, and Haibat Khán, called Gurg-andáz, "the wolf-slayer," who had posted themselves in Ethwah, fought for three days, after which they begged for mercy, and surrendered that fortress. Sultán Bahlol appointed Ibráhím Khán Lohání to command in Etáwah, and assigned some parganas of Etáwah to Rái Dádand. He then went with a numerous force against Sultan Husain; they met at the village of Rángánw, which belongs to Kálpí, and both parties were engaged for some time in preparation for battle. The river Junna was between them. At this period Rái Tilak Chand, the governor of the territory of Baksar,1 came to pay his respects to Sultán Bahlol, and took his army across the river by a ford, against the troops of Sultan Husain, who, being too weak to resist, fled to the Panna 2 country, the Rájú of which place came out to meet him, and presented him with some lacs of tankas, and 100 horses and elephants, after which he sent his own soldiers with him as far as Janupúr.

Sultán Bahlol collected a body of men, with the intention of gaining possession of Janupúr, and when he drew near, Sultán Husain, being unable to resist, retired toward Bahráich, towards which place Sultán Bahlol likewise directed his steps, and they met on the banks of the Rahab.³ After a contest, which ended as usual in the defeat of Sultán Husain, the whole of the regalia ⁴ fell into the hands of the Lodís. Sultán Bahlol, after the victory, made up his mind to go to Janupúr, which place he took possession of. Leaving Mubárak Khán to govern Jaunpúr, and Kutb Khán Lodí and Khán Jahán, with some other nobles, in the territory of Manjhaulí, he himself proceeded in the direction of Badáún. Sultán Husain availed himself of the opportunity thus offered, and returned to Jaunpúr, with a large army; upon which the nobles of Sultán Bahlol quitted Jaunpúr and went to Manjhaulí; but finding themselves unable to hold that place, they entered into an arrangement with Sultán Husain, and amused him under various artifices, devised by Kutb Khán, until such time as succour should arrive. Sultán Bahlol sent his own son, Bárbak Sháh, to aid them, and also followed in person. Sultán Husain, being unable to do anything, went to Bihár.

When Sultán Bahlol arrived in the town of Haldí, he heard the news of the death of Kutb Khán Lodí, the son of Islám Khán, the Sultán's uncle. After passing some days in the performance of the customary mourning, he went to Jaunpúr; and having established Bárbak Sháh on the throne there, returned himself to Kálpí, which place he gave to 'Azam Humáyún,¹ the son of Prince Khwája Báyazíd. He then proceeded to Dhúlpúr by the road of Chandawár; and the Ráí of Dhúlpúr came forth to meet him, and presented him with some mans of gold, so that the Ráí was treated as a well-wisher of the State. The Sultán marched thence and came to the pargana of Bárí. Ikbál Khán, the governor of Bárí, having paid his respects in a fitting and respectful manner, was appointed a servant of the State. He made an offering of some mans of gold to the Sultán, who confirmed him in the possession of Bárí.

The nobles are represented by the same historian as considering the succession to be the right of 'Azam Humayan.

From thence, proceeding towards Alláhápúr, a dependency of Rantambhor, he overran that country, and spoiled its fields and gardens. After which he came to Dehlí, where he remained, and spent some time in ease and festivity, in performing deeds of justice and displaying liberality.

At the close of the rainy season and the rising of the star Canopus, he went to Gwálior, the ruler of which place, Rájá Mán, came forth to show his obedience; and after presenting an offering of eighty lacs of tankas, he was confirmed in the possession of Gwálior.3 From that place the Sultán marched to Etáwah, from the government of which place he dismissed Ráí Sangat Sing, the son of Rái Dádand,4 and then went back to Dehlí. On the road he fell sick, on account of the excessive heat, and near the village of Maláwí,5 which is in the territory of Sakit, in the year A.H. 894 (A.D. 1488), he departed from this transitory and troublesome existence to the regions of eternity, in obedience to the summons of the Almighty.6 .He reigned during the space of thirty-eight years eight months and eight days; and one of the most learned men of the age has made this verse in his praise:-"In the year 894 departed from the earth the mighty monarch, the vanquisher of kingdoms, the world-conqueror Bahlol."7

² Among the Extracts from Ahmad Yádgár (supra, p. 4), will be found passages relating to transactions with the Rái of Udipur and Ahmad Khán Bhatti. It is impossible to assign their proper dates.

"Bahlol Lodf was esteemed a virtuous and a mild prince, executing justice to the utmost of his knowledge, and treating his courtiers rather as companions than subjects.
When he obtained the crown, he divided the public treasure among his friends, and Sultán Sikandar then pursued his march to Kálpí, of which he dispossessed 'Azam Humáyán, the son of Prince Khwája Báyazíd, and bestowed it upon Mahmúd Khán Lodí. After which he proceeded to Baksar Chhetra, whose governor, Tátár Khán, showed the most entire homage and allegiance to him, and was confirmed in the government of Chhetra. He then directed his progress to Gwálior; from whence he despatched Khwája Muhammad Farmulí with an honorary dress to Rájá Mán, who acknowledged his authority, and sent in return a nephew of his to attend upon the Sultán. His way now led him to Bayána, where Sultán Ashraf, a son of Ahmad Khán Jalwání, presented himself before him, professing his submission. He was, nevertheless, ordered to evacuate Bayána, and to take in exchange Jalesar, Mahrera, Chandawár, and Sakít. Ashraf, in conformity with this command, took 'Umar Khán Sarwání with him to Bayana, under the pretence of delivering the keys over to him; but when within the walls, he foolishly drew the shield of rebellion over his face, closed the gates, and put the fort in a state of defence, and was imitated by Haibat Khán Jalwání, one of his vassals, in Agra, which was a dependency of Bayana.

The Sultan had, in the meanwhile, pitched his tents on the banks of the Jumna, whither he retired in order to avoid the heat, and amuse himself with fishing. When the news of these occurrences arrived, he left some of his chiefs to lay siege to Agra, and drew his army back to Bayána, which he closely invested. Sultán Ashraf, being hard pressed, offered to surrender, and thus Bayána was conquered in the year 8971 (1492 A.D.). Sultán Sikandar entrusted the fort to Khán-khánán Farmulí, and himself returned to Dehlí. He had arrived at this place only twenty-four days, when intelligence was brought from Jaunpur, that the samindars of that province, headed by the Bachgotis, had collected together a force of nearly 100,000 men, horse and foot, and deposed Mubárak Khán, the governor of Jaunpúr, and even killed his brother Sher Khán; that Mubárak Khán himself had crossed the Ganges by the ferry of Júsí, but had fallen into Mullá Khán's hands; upon which Ráí Bhíd, Rájá of Panna, had seized and carried him off a prisoner. Bárbak Sháh, from his inability to offer resistance, abandoned Jaunpur, and retreated to Muhammad Khán Farmulí, who bore the title of Kálá Pahár ('black mountain'). The Sultán marched in 899 (1493-4), in that direction, and when he arrived at Dalamau, Bárbak Sháh and all his nobles presented themselves humbly before him, and were received with royal favour and kindness. Ráí Bhíd, being apprehensive of the Sultán's displeasure, sent Mubárak Khán to the Sultán; upon which, the latter proceeded to Katehr, where the samindars had concentrated themselves in large numbers, and offered a wellcontested battle; but being finally defeated, dispersed themselves in all directions, and the army of Islam captured a great quantity of booty.

He was extremely temperate in his diet, and seldom ate at home. Though a man of no great literary acquirement himself, he was fond of the company of learned men, whom he rewarded according to their merit. He placed great reliance on the courage of his Mughal troops, on which account they met with such encouragement among his relations and courtiers, that it is estimated there were nearly 20,000 Mnghals in the service of the government during his reign. He was a wise and brave prince, and personally well acquainted with Muhammadan law. He also studied the best institutes for maintaining order in his government, which he invariably adopted. He was prudent, and, above all things, deprecated hurrying matters of State; and, indeed, his conduct throughout life sufficiently evinced how much he practised this quality."

He now returned victorious to Jaunpur, and having for the second time settled the administration of the place upon Bárbak Sháh, he again set out on his return to Dehlí. He enjoyed himself in field sports during one month in the neighbourhood of Oudh; but when he reached Katehr, he received intelligence that Bárbak Sháh could not maintain himself in Jaunpur against the attacks of the zamindárs; upon which the Sultán detached Muhammad Khán Farmulí, 'Azam Humáyún, Khán Jahán, and Khán-khánán Lohání by way of Oudh, and Mubárak Khán by that of Karra, with orders to put Barbak Shah in chains, and send him to Court. This being faithfully executed, he gave him in charge to 'Umar Khán Sarwaní and Haibat Khán, and proceeded himself to the fort of Chunár to chastise some nobles of Sultán Husain Sharkí. These, however, after giving battle, were obliged to retreat, and fortified themselves in Chunár, which being very strong and almost impregnable, he did not stop to besiege it, but proceeded towards Kantit, a dependency of Panna;1 the Rájá of which place, Rái Bhíd, came out to meet him, and proffered his allegiance, for which the Sulfan confirmed him in the possession of Kantít, and moved on to Arail and Bayák. It was at this time that Ráí Bhíd, in consequence of his suspicious temper, abandoned all his camp-equipage and effects, and fled. The Sultan ordered his whole property to be collected together, and sent to the Rájá.2 On his arrival at Arail, he ordered the gardens and habitations of that district to be laid waste; after which, he proceeded, by the way of Karra, to Dalamau, where he married the widow of Sher Khán Lohání, who was one of the most beautiful and intelligent women of the age; and then continued his march to Shamsábád, from whence, after a stay of six months, he proceeded to Sambhal, but returned again from thence to Shamsábád. On his way thither, he destroyed a place called Pareotákal, the sink and receptacle of marauders, and put to death most of that rebellious gang.

After spending the rainy season at Shamsábád, in A.H. 900 (1494-5), he set out in the direction of Panna, for the purpose of chastising Rájá Bhíd; but on his arrival at Khán Ghátí, he fell in with his son Bír Sing Deo, who offered battle, but, being put to flight, fled towards Panna, pursued by the army of Islám. On the Sultán's arrival at Panna, Rájá Bhíd fled towards Sirguja, but died on the road. Sultan Sikandar then penetrated as far as Phaphind, belonging to Panna;1 but he was compelled to retreat to Janupur, in consequence of the extreme scarcity of provisions, opinm, salt, and oil. Besides which, almost all the horses perished; so much so, that ninety out of every hundred died. In consequence of this, Lakhní Chand, a son of Rájá Bhíd, and all the zamindárs wrote to Sultán Husain, representing that Sikandar did not possess a single horse, all having perished. Husain, upon this, marched out of Bihar at the head of a largo force, including 100 elephants, with the intention of defeating Sultan Sikandar; who, having crossed tho Ganges at the ferry of Kantít, went first to Chunár, and thence to Benáres. He detached Khán-khánán to Salbáhan, the son of Rájá Bhid, with directions to conciliate him, and induce him to accompany the Khán. Meanwhile, Sultán Husain had reached within thirteen kos of Benáres, and Sultán Sikandar drew near with all expedition; and having marshalled his troops, with the divino aid, commenced the engagement, supported by Salbában, who had opportunely arrived to his support. The battle was well contested; but at length the fortune of the day suddenly turned against Sultán Husain, who fled towards Patna; but being closely pursued by Sultan Sikandar at the head of 100,000 cavalry, he took the route of Bihar. After the lapse of nine days, Sultán Sikandar succeeded in reaching Husain's camp, and then heard that he had fled to Bihar. Thither also ho was pursued by Sikandar, and on his ascertaining this to be the case, he left Malik Kandú behind in the fort, and sought shelter at Khalgánw, a dependency of Lakhnautí.2 Sultán Sikan-dar then detached from his camp at Deobár, a force to lay waste Bíhar. Malik Kandú, from his inability to resist the Sultán's troops, took to flight, and Bihár thus fell into the possession of the Sultán. Sikandar having left Muhabbat Khán, together with several chiefs, in Bihár, proceeded to Darweshpúr, where he left Khán-khánán in charge of his camp, and advanced himself in all haste to Tirhút, whose Rájá advanced to receive him with all humiliation, and agreed to the payment of several lacs of tankas as a fine, for the receipt of which the Sultán left Mubárak Khán behind, and proceeded a second time to Darweshpúr.

¹ The Makhzan-i Afgháni (MS. p. 100) says "Kanauj." But though there is a Phaphánd in the Doáb, which was formerly a dependency of Kanauj, this evidently refers to some other wilder district in the Bundelkhand hills. Dorn in his translation also has "Kanauj."

About the same time intelligence of the mal-administration and misconduct of Asghar, the governor of Dehlí, reaching the sublime ear, Khawas Khan, governor of Machiwara, was commissioned to apprehend and transmit him to Court. But prior to the arrival of Khawas Khan, Asghar, on the 1st of Safar, 906 H. (27 August, 1500), flod from Dehlí to Sambhal, to offer his submission; but by the high command of the Sultan, he was seized and thrown into prison. Khawas Khan repaired to Dehli, and leaving thore his son Isma'íl Khán, returned, according to orders, to Sambhal. The Sultán received him most graciously, and presented him with an honorary vest. Seen after, Sa'id Khán Sarwání, who belonged to the seditious party, came from Lahoro to pay his respects. The Sultan banished him, together with Tátár Khán, Muhammad Sháh, and the other disaffected chiefs, from his ompire; and they accordingly took the route of Gwalior, and went off in hasto to Malwa and Gujarat.

with valuable presents to the Sultán; but when the envoy was admitted to him, he returned such coarse and improper answers to the questions put to him, that the Sultán, in a rage, uttered a threat 1 that he would himself command an expedition against the fort (of Gwálior) and capture it.

Meanwhile, the report of the death of Khán-khánán Farmuli, governor of Bayana, having reached the Sultan, he appointed the two sons of the deceased, 'Imád and Sulaimán, to succeed him; but as Bayána, owing to its strong fort and frontier situation, was the scat of sedition and tunnelt, they both came with their attendants to Sambhal, to consult with the Sultan about some affairs. Deeming their arrival inopportune, he appointed Khawás Khán governor of Bayána; and after somo days, Safdar Khán was nominated governor of Agra, one of its dependencies. 'Imád and Sulaimán he gavo Shamsábád, Jalesár, Manglaur, Sháhábád, and some other districts. After that, he ordered 'Alam Khán Mewáttí, and Khán-khánán Lohání, jágirdár of Ráprí, in conjunction with Khawas Khan, to reduce the fort of Dhúlpúr, and wrest it from the hands of Rái Mánik-dee. When these chiefs, in execution of the command, directed their route against that place, the rai came out to repel force by force, and much life was daily lost on both sides. Amongst the killed was Kliwaja Ben, one of the most gallant of combatants.

On account of these occurrences, Sikandar himself marched on Friday, the 6th Ramazán, 906 (March, 1501), upon Dhúlpúr; but Rajá Mánik-dco, placing a garrison in the castle, retreated to Gwálior. This detachment, however, being unable to defend it, and abandoning the fort by night, it fell into the hands of the Muhammadan army. Sikandar, on entering the fort, fell down on his knees, and returned thanks to God, and celebrated his victory. The whole army was employed in plundering, and all the groves which spread their shade for seven kos around Bayána were torn up from the roots. After a residence of one month in Dhúlpúr, the Sultán marched to Gwálior. There he left Adam Lodí, with most of the nobles, and passing the Chambal, encamped for two months on the banks of the Así or Mendhí, where his people fell sick, owing to the badness of the water. Rájá Mán not only delegated ambassadors for peace, but expelled from the fort Sa'id Khán, Bábú Khán, and Rái Ganesh, who had formerly deserted the Sultán, and taken refuge with him. Besides that, he sent his eldest son, Bikramájít, to wait upon the Sultán, who bestowed upon him a robe of honour and a horse, and then allowed him to depart. From thence the Sultán returned towards Agra; and when he reached Dhúlpúr, he bestowed that district upon Rái Bináik-deo, Afterwards, he set out for Bayána, the seat of the empire, which he honoured with his presence, and spent there the rainy season.

In Ramazán of the year 910 (1504 A.D.), after the rising of Canopus, he raised the standard of war for the reduction of the fort of Mandráil; but the garrison capitulating, and delivering up the citadel, the Sultán ordered the temples of idols to be demolished, and mosques to be constructed. After leaving Míán Makan and Mujáhid Khán to protect the fort, he himself moved out on a plundering expedition into the surrounding country, where he butchered many people, took many prisoners, and devoted to utter destruction all the groves and habitations; and after gratifying and honouring himself by this exhibition of holy zeal; he returned to his capital Bayána.

In the same year the heat of the air became so intense, that almost all the people fell grievously sick of fevers. It had for a long time occurred to the Sultán to found a town on the banks of the Jumna, which was to be the residence of the Sultán, and the head-quarters of the army, and to serve to keep the rebels of that quarter in awe, and deprive them of further opportunity of growing refractory, for frequently the jágirdárs and government servants and the peasantry in general in sarkár Bayána had complained of the violence to which they were subject. With this view, he commissioned, in the year 911 (1505)

A.D.), some judicious and intelligent men to explore the banks of the river, and report upon any locality which they might consider the most eligible. Accordingly, the exploring party left Dehli in boats, and, as they proceeded, examined earefully both sides of the river, until they arrived at the spot where Agra now stands; and having approved of it, communicated their selection to the Sultán. Upon this, he left Dehlí and marched to Mathura, where he took boat, amusing himself by the way with various kinds of sport. When he approached the site indicated, he observed two elevated spots which seemed suitable for building; and inquired of Mihtar Mulla Khan, who was called 'Naik,' and commanded the royal barge, which of those two mounds appeared to him the most suitable. He replied, "That which is A'gra, or in advance, is the preforable one." The Sultán smiled, and said, "The name of this city then shall be ealled Agra." He then repeated the fatiha, and in an auspicious moment issued orders for founding the city, when portions of mausa' Pashi and mauza' Poya, pargana Dúlí, sarkúr Bayána, were occupied for that purpose; and the pargana of Agra was henceforward added to the fifty-two parganas which comprised the sarkar of Bayana. From that period this city continued to advance in population, and became the seat of government of the Sultans of Hind.

The Sultán, after giving orders for the construction of a fort, went towards Dhúlpur; and on entering the fort, transferred the charge of it from Ráí Bináik-deo to Malik Mu'izzu-d dín, and himself returned to Ágra, giving his nobles leave to retire to their respective jágirs.

On Sunday, the 3rd of Safar, 911 (July, 1505 A.D.), a violent earthquake occurred at Agra, and even the very hills quaked, and lofty buildings were thrown down. The living thought the day of judgment had arrived; the dead, the day of resurrection. No such earthquake had been known in Hindústán since the days of Adam, nor is any such recorded in the page of history. One of the able scholars of Hind has traced its date in the word "Kází." Many people say, that on the self-same day an earthquake was felt throughout most of the provinces of Hindústán.1

When the rains had passed, and some time even after the rising of Canopus, towards the close of the year 911, the Sultán went towards Gwálior. He remained a month and a half at Dhúlpúr, and then went to the Chambal, where he remained several months encamped near the ferry of Gaur. Having left Prince Jalál Khán and other Kháns there, he himself advanced to wage the holy war and to plunder the country of the infidels. He butchered most of the people who had fled for refuge to the hills and forests, and the rest he pillaged and put in fetters. As scarcity was felt in his camp, in consequence of the nonarrival of the Banjáras,2 he despatched 'Azam Humáyún for the purpose of bringing in supplies; but when he was on his march, he was attacked by the Rájá of Gwálior in an ambuscade at Chatáwar, about ten kos from that place. A bloody action followed, when Dáúd Khán and Ahmad Khán, the sons of Khán Jahán, displayed signal bravery; and as the Sultán's army came up from the rear to render assistance, the Rájpúts were put to flight, and many were either slain or taken captive. The Sultán bestowed the title of Malik Dád upon Dáúd, and treated him with the greatest kindness. Afterwards, in consequence of the approach of the rainy season, he bent his steps towards Agra, after leaving some of his chief nobles at Dhúlpúr. At the capital he passed his time in pleasure and amusement.

In 912, after the rising of Canopus, the Sultán went towards the fort of Awantgar, and sent on 'Imád Khán Farmulí and Mujáhid Khán, with several thousand cavalry and 100 elephants, to reconnoitre the place, while he himself remained behind. He conferred the office of chamberlain on Kází 'Abdu-lla, the son of Táhir, of Kábul, a resident of the town of Thánesar, and on Shaikh 'Umar and Shaikh Ibráhím. Kálpí, after the death of Mahmúd Khán Lodí, had been bestowed upon his son Jalál Khán; but as quarrels arose between him and his brothers, they represented matters to the Sultán. Upon this, the Sultán sent Fíroz Aghwán to bring into his presence Bhíkan Khán and Ahmad Khán, the brothers of Jalál Khán, and on their arrival, they were received by him on the banks of the Chambal with royal favour and kindness.

On the 23rd of the month the Sultan invested the fort, and ordered the whole army to put forth their best energies to capture it. At the time which the astrologers had declared to be propitious, he himself advanced to the attack, and the contest raged on every side. The bloodthirsty soldiers hung on the walls like so many ants or locusts, and displayed the most daring courage. All of a sudden, by the favour of God, the gale of victory blew on the standards of the Sultán, and the gate was forced open by Malik 'Aláu-d dín. After making a stout resistance, the garrison begged for quarter, but no one listened to them. The Rájpúts, retiring within their own houses, continued the contest, and slew their families after the custom of jauhar. Meanwhile, an arrow pierced the eye of Malik 'Aláu-d dín, and blinded him. After due thanksgivings for his victory, the Sultán gave over charge of the fort to Makan and Mujahid Khan, with directions that they should destroy the idol-temples, and raise mosques in their places; but on its being represented that Mujáhid Khán had received a bribe from the Rájá of Awantgar, on the understanding that he was to induce the Sultán to retire from that country, the Sultán, on the 16th Muharram, 913 (28th May, 1507), seized Mauláná Juman, who was in the special confidence of Mujáhid Khán, and made over the fort to Malik Táju-d dín, and directed the Kháns who were at Dhúlpúr to imprison Mujáhid Khán. The Sultán returned towards Agra at the close of Muharram, 913. During this march he made a halt one day, iu consequence of the narrowness and unevenness of the road, in order that the people might pass through without any scramble or precipitation; but here the whole camp was greatly distressed for want of water, and a large number of men perished from that cause, as well as from being trampled and erushed by the beasts of burden, which were all huddled together in a confused mass. A jar of water could not be procured under fifteen Sikandarí tankas. Some men died from exhaustion, and some, who had found water, quenched their thirst with such avidity that they also fell victims to their excess. When an account was rendered, it was found that 800 men had perished.

On the 27th of Muharram, the Sultan reached Dhúlpár, and after some days entered Agra, where he spent the season of the rains. On the rising of Canopus, he started on an expedition to Narwar, one of the dependencies of Málwá.

Sullán Sikandar's proceedings at Hatkant, Lucknow, Nágor, and Lest-Sheopúr.

After remaining one month at the town of Lahair, where he received a visit from Ni'amat Khátún, in the year 915 (1509 A.D.), the Sultán directed his route towards Hatkánt, which he secured of idolaters and banditti; and when he had put to the sword the rebels of that quarter, and established small posts at every place, he returned again to his capital. Soon after, information was conveyed to him, that Ahmad Khán, son of Mubárak Khán, governor of Lucknow, had associated with infidels, and even apostatized from the true faith; on which he issued a farmán to Muhammad Khán, a brother of Ahmad Khán, to secure and send him to Court. It was also about this time that Muhammad Khán, a grandson of Sultán Násiru-d dín of Málwá, from dread of his grandfather, sued for protection at the Imperial Court. A farmán was issued to Prince Jalál Khán, importing that as sarkár Chanderí had been settled on Muhammad Khán, he was to be

² This means that he had held it as a jdgirdar of Malwa, for it belonged to that kingdom, not to Dehli. And we learn from the Makhzan-i Afghani and this work, that Sultan Sikandar had two years previously attempted to procure its surrender to him by Shahabu-d din, a discentented son of the King of Malwa. Subsequently we firmly supported in its possession, and that the Prince was to avert from him any molestation on the part of the army of Málwá. The Sultán himself went to Dhúlpúr, for the purpose of hunting; and caused a pavilion and palace to be erected at each stage between that place and the capital.

When, in the year 916 (1510 A.D.), his empire was firmly established and prospering, in a fortunate moment, while he was engaged in his field sports, another kingdom fell into his net. The facts were briefly as follows: 'Alí Khán and Abú Bakr, two relations of Muhammad Khán, ruler of Nágor, concerted a plot against their master, and endeavoured by stratagem to make away with him, and seize possession of his country. He, however, being informed of their treachery, prevented them from executing their plans, and determined to inflict capital punishment on them. Upon this, both of them effecting their escape, repaired to the Court of the Sultán. Muhammad, apprehensive of the evil consequences arising from the enmity of his relations, the disaffection of his intimates, and their having taken refuge with this powerful Sultán, sent not only the assurance of his allegiance, with a great many valuable rarities and offerings to him, but ordered the khutba to be read and coin to be struck at Nágor in the Sultán's name. The report of this submission gave the monarch such joy and delight, that he sent Muhammad Khán a horse and honorary dress. He then left Dhúlpúr, and honoured the capital, Agra, with his presence, and spent some time in a round of pleasure and fêtes, in visiting of gardens and in hunting expeditions.

It was about this time that Agra, formerly a dependency of Bayána, was fixed upon for the residence of the sovereign; but he soon after departed from Dhúlpúr, and transmitted an order shall find Buhjat Khan, governor on the part of Mahmud, King of Malwa, placing Chanderi in the possession of the Sultan; and this work also informs us (MS. p. 172) that early in the reign of Sultan Ibrahim he appointed Shaikhzada Manjhur to the government of Chanderi, and gave the office of peshwa to Sultan Muhammad, grandson of the King of Malwa. Dorn has by an oversight (p. 73) translated the corresponding passage of the Makhran-i Afghani, "under peshwa Sultan Muhammad."

to Sulaimán, a son of Khán-khánán Farmulí, to advance with his large army towards Awantgar and the confines of Súisúpur, in support of the new convert, Husain, whose name before was Rái Dungar. But Sulaimán excused himself, by alleging that he could not prevail upon himself to be so remote from the King's person.\(^1\) The Sultán then went to the town of Bárí, and made over that pargana to Shaikhzáda Makan, having resumed it from the son of Mubárak Khán. Then, after staying intermediately at Dhúlpúr, he returned to Ágra; where, according to former custom, he issued farmáns to many of the chief nobles on all the frontiers to call them to Court. It was at this time that he was taken ill. * * *

REIGN OF SULTAN IBRAHIM LODÍ.

Punishment of the Zamindars of Jartoli.—Capture of Kalpi.

About the time of 'Azam Humáyún's junction with Ibráhím Lodí, 'Umar Khán, son of Sikandar Khán Súr, having lost his life while fighting against a body of the zamindárs of Jartolí, a place dopendent on Kol, and receptacle of the most notorious vagabonds and rebels, Kásim Khán, governor of Sambhal, marched to that place, and inflicted the merited punishment upon them. Having put their leader to death, and suppressed the rebellion, he waited on the Sultán at Kanauj. Most of the nobles in the súba of Oudh, Jaunpúr, and Lucknow, including Sa'íd Khán and Shaikhzáda Farmulí, came likewise to pay their respects, having abandoned the cause of Jalál Khán, and were enrolled amongst the servants of the State. In short, everything seemed to promise success to the Sultán. The Sultán soon after detatehed 'Azam Humáyún Lodí, 'Azam Humáyún Sarwání, and Nasír Khán Lohání, with a formidable army, and feroeious elephants, against Jalálu-d dín, who was at Kálpí. Previous to their arrival, he had left 'Imádn-l Mulk, Malik Badru-d dín Jalwání, and Ni'amat Khátún, together with the family of Kutb Khán Lodí and his whole harem, in the fort of Kálpí, and marched himself towards the capital, with 30,000 cavalry and several elephants, in order that he might spread alarm throughout the province, and capture, if possible, the fort of Agra. The nobles of the Sultán, on their arrival before Kálpí, laid siege to it, and for some days the contest was carried on with cannons and matchlocks; but, in the end, the garrison surrendered, and delivered up the keys of the fort. The town was plundered, and rich booty captured by Sultán Ibráhím's troops. * * *

² Dr. Dorn (History of the Afghdns, p. 72) represents this very differently. That 'Umar Khan was himself the victor, and returned triumphantly to Kanauj, and nothing is said of Malik Kasim. As my Makhzan-i Afghani (p. 128) corresponds with the statement in the text, I suspect there must be an omission in Dr. Dorn's manuscript.

Rebellion of Bahadur Khán in Bihár.—Of Daulat Khán Lodi in the Panjab.—Bábar's Invasion of Hindústán.

Not long after, Daryá Khán Lohání [governor of Bihár] died; and his son, Bahádur Khán, succeeding to his father's dignity, assumed the new title of Muhammad Sháh, at the same time ordering the khutba to be read and coin to be struck in his name. He equipped an army of 100,000 horso, and having been joined by the nobles who were disaffected against the Sultán, they united their forces on the borders of Bihár. At the same time, Nasír Khán Lohání, the governor of Gházípúr, who commanded the Imperial forces, sustained a defeat, and came in to Bahádur Khán.

¹ The original says merely, "Nasír Khán having sustained a defeat from the army of the Sultán, came before him." The Makhzan-i Afghání (MS. p. 137) says precisely tho same. The passage is very confused, but the Sultán alluded to is the new Sultán, Muhammad Sháh. Yet Dr. Dorn translates (p. 77), "Nasír Khán, after his defeat, returned to the Sultán (i.e. Ibráhím), but was ordered to take the field afresh with a strong army, and to destroy the usurper," for which there is ne authority in his original. The meaning is made altogether plain by the Wāki āt-i Mushtāki:—"Mián Mustafá plundored Gházípúr, whenee he expelled Nasír Khán, who came to Sultán Muhammad." (MS. p. 83.) This Mián Mustafá was brother of Shaikh Báyazíd Farmulí, who subsequently made himself conspicuous under Bábar. The Mián had been sent at the head of a large army against Nasír Khán of Gházípúr, and died near the Soane. Wo find Nasír Khán again in possession of Gházípúr in Bábar's time.—Memoirs, p. 349.

In short, the whole country of Bihár was reduced under the orders of Sultán Muhammad, and Ibráhím raised a large force to repress this alarming insurrection.

About the same period the son of Daulat Khán Lodí, governor of Lahore, presented himself before the Sultán: but inferring from the usual proceedings of this monarch, that he would be apprehended, he took to flight, and repaired to his father, to whom he gave a full account of the Sultan's temper, and the general dread entertained by the nobles. Daulat Khán, from these accounts, perceiving that there was no means of evading the Sultan's violence, and being sensible of his own inadequacy to oppose him, formed an alliance with Ghází Khán Lodí, and the other nobles and jágirdárs of the Panjáb; and renouncing his allegiance to Sultán Ibráhím, addressed through 'Álam Khán Lodí an invitation to the Emperor Bábar at Kábul, to repair to Hindústán., No sooner had this monarch perused the letter, than he despatched some of his most distinguished nobles with 'Alam Khán, in advance, to subdue the country; who, when · they had taken Siálkot and Lahore, reported these conquests to the Emperor. Upon which, he himself, on the first days of the first Rabí', in the year 932 (December, 1525), entered upon a campaign to reduce Hindústán.

'Alam Khán, on his arrival at Lahore, proposed to the Mughal chiefs that, as they had been sent to render him assistance, they should advance with him at once against Sultán Ibráhím, and take Dehlí, before Bábar's arrival. But this the Mughals refusing to comply with, 'Alam Khán separated from them, and marched, at the head of 40,000 horse, upon Dehlí, which he invested. When Sultán Ibráhím received the account of these transactions, he hastened out of Agra with 80,000 horse, and pitched his camp at a distance of six miles from Dehlí. But 'Alam Khán one night surprised him so successfully, that, his army being dispersed, and he himself, with about 5000 or 6000 men, cut off from the main body, was compelled to withdraw to some place of security. Early in the morning he received information that 'Alam Khán was standing protected by only 300 horse; whilst the rest of his troops were employed in plundering and collecting booty. That moment appeared to afford him an excellent opportunity of gaining important advantages for himself; so, with the rising of the sun, he threw himself upon his foe, like a hill of iron, who, incapable of parrying this charge, fled into the Doáb; but the greater number of his gallant men were slain, and the remainder were dispersed in all directions, which rendered the Sultán's trimmph complete.

About this timo Bábar Pádsháh arrived at Lahoro; when Ghází Khán and Danlat Khán, in violation of the subsisting treaty, advanced against the fort of Bilwat.\(^1\) The prime minister of the Mughal Emperor, Mír Khalífa, brought 'Alam Khán to pay his respects to the Emperor, and he was well received. After some time, Daulat Khán also presented himself in submission before the Emperor, and his example was imitated by Diláwar Khán.

The Emperor marched from Lahoro towards Sámána and Sannám, and detached Tardí Beg Khán, with 4000 horse, in advance; to opposo whom, the Sultán sent Dáúd Khán, one of his principal amirs, at the head of 10,000 cavalry, besides a train of elephants. Upon information of his approach, Tardí Beg marshalled his troops, and concerted a night attack upon Dáúd Khán's camp; who, unable to sustain the shock of the aggressor, fell back, and his troops were dispersed in all directions, many of his men were slain, and Dáúd Khán himself, with seventy men of high rank, fell into the lands of the enemy. * * *

Sher Shah's dying regrets.

On being remonstrated with for giving way to low spirits, when he had done so much for the good of the people during his short reign, after urgent solicitation, he said, "I have had three apartment, pursued by Sikandar; whom he, however, succeeded in excluding by chaining the door. The greater part of the amirs had previously thrown away their swords and fled; and Sikandar stalked about everywhere like a madman, and in this manner two hours clapsed. At last, Ibráhím Khán Súr, brotherin-law of 'Adalí, drew his sword and attacked Sikandar; who, being surrounded on all sides, was killed; and Daulat Khán Lohání despatched Muhammad Farmulí with one blow. The result of these transactions was a general dispersion of the amirs, 'Adalí's authority rapidly declined, and every one looked after his own interest alone, as seen as he had secured his personal safety by flight.

Before this scene transpired, Táj Kirání, a brother of Sulaimán, having, from the different expressions of the Council, foreseen what would happen, had left the Council-room, and proceeded as far as the gate of the citadel of Gwalior, by which he was about to descend, when he met Shah Muhammad Farmuli. He explained to him the approprious state of the Council, and said that no respect was shown to any one, and that there was no unanimity in their deliberations; it was therefore the safest way not to frequent the Council any more, but to retire into private life: he himself would not appear any more. He invited Shah Muhammad to join him, and repair to a place affording security against misery, till affairs took a better turn. Shah Muhammad rejected this offer, in consequence of which he was killed in that riotous Tái Kirání went to his house, and made all preparations for flight. When he had received intelligence of what had passed, he set out in the afternoon for Bengal, and 'Adalí despatched an army in pursuit of him.1 * * *

The vanguard of the Mughal army, which, in seven divisions, had marched in advance of the main body, pitched their camp at a distance of three kos from the defile of Garhi; and every morning, nrging their horses at full speed towards the entrance of the pass, threw their arrows and clubs at its defenders, and then retreated. A part of them, with loud voices, poured forth most bitter invectives against Jalal Khan, calling him an unmanly coward, cowering in the defile like an old woman; that if he were a man, and the son of a man, and in the least endowed with impetnosity and ardonr, he would descend to the field of battle to measure strength with men, as he had not yet come in contact with Mughals. Similar invectives were repeated every day, and a great number of Afghans perished by the fire of the cannons and matchlocks. Jalal Khan, being informed of these proceedings by his attendants, went one day to Hájí Khán, explaining to him, with the bitterest complaints, that the Mughals, coming up every day to harass them in their position by missile weapons, and then retreating, uttered the most abusive language against him, which he could not brook any longer, for his patience was quite exhausted. He himself certainly was too weak to put a stop to such injuries; but if the other chiefs would assent, they ought at once to march out and make their attack, and see what the curtain of secresy would reveal. Hájí Khán said, "This is not in accordance with your father's command, with which you are well acquainted." Jalál Khán went on to assure him that as long as his request should not be complied with, he was determined to abstain from water and food. Upon which Hájí Khán replied, that if such was his resolution, he certainly must yield; and every coward returning alive from the battle would suffer punishment by Sher Khán's order; but in case victory should crown their enterprise, all would be right. He then, in order to insure success to his enterprise, read the fátiha, and Jalál Khán withdrew to his own quarters.

The details of what transpire units will be found among the Extracts from the Tarikh-i Ddudt, Vol. I

The next morning the Mughals, according to custom, charged their horses, and then retreated to their tents, and relieved themselves of their armour. The troopers then went out to forage, whilst the officers resorted to the carpet of repose. Noon had approached, when the Afgháns, opening the gate in the defile, sallied forth. A fow only of the Mughals, whose horses were at hand, mounted, and put themselves in an attitude of defence; but the greater part, being disconcerted in the extreme, turned their faces to flight. The action, nevertheless, proved to be of the most obstinate nature, and Mubárak Farmulí and Abú-l Fath Langáh, besides most of the Mughal officers, fell victims to the sword. The whole camp of the Mughals, baggage, horses, camels, elephants, etc., fell into the hands of the victors; and nearly all were slain, with the exception of a very small number of Kipehí horsemen. It is related that there was no Afghán footman but obtained four or five horses, valuable robes, and many boxes of precious things, out of the spoils.¹

Shor Khán had such a mass of wealth and treasures to carry off from Gaur, that he could not gather a sufficient number of porters for that purposo, and was at a great loss how to eonvey these effects to Rolitás. In the meanwhile, he received intelligence from Jalál Khán of this victory, at which he was exceedingly rejoiced; and immediately wrote to him, to procure, for a . suitable compensation, all the captured elephants, camels, oxen, in short all beasts of burthen, from any person who might possess them, and to send them, as he was in much want of them. Sher Khán, upon the oceasion of that victory, made use of this adage, "That if a cock, in a fight, had been once beaten, he would, on being brought into the field a second time, set up his crowing, but never resume the fight." Jalál Khán after this exploit closed the gate, and stopped the progress of Humáyún for more than a month-a circumstance that enabled Sher Khán at his ease to transport by way of Jhárkand all his treasures to Rohtás, whither he now likewise called Jalál Khán.

The Emperor Humáyún, upon this, made his entrance into Gaur. Sher Khán had previously fitted up all the mansions of that place with an exquisite variety of ornaments and embellishments, and rendered them a perfect gallery of pietures, by party-eoloured earpets and costly silk stuffs, in hopes that Humáyún charmed with it, would be induced to prolong his stay there; and his designs were unexpectedly seconded by fate, for Humáyún remained four months in Ganr, and had no leisure for any other occupation than pleasure and enjoyment.

The Battle of Chaunsa .- Capture of Humayun's Queen.

In this conflict Muhammad Zamán, with a large force, stood forth and commenced the action; but was, in one charge, not only defeated and obliged to retreat, but killed. There was no one who could withstand; and every one who found his horse ready turned his face to flight. A bridge of boats having been previously laid over the Gauges, all the fugitives, whether horse or foot, endeavoured to escape over it. Humáyún had not yet performed his ablutions, when his troops were thrown into complete disorder; ho therefore, immediately finishing them, lent all his thoughts to save his own person; for to save his favourite lady, with all the other beauties of the harem, was impossible. He sent Khwája Mu'azzam, with some other persons who were just at hand, in this painful situation, to rescue Begam Mariam Makani from her dangerous position, whilst he himself hastened to reach the bridge; but it having been broken down by the throng of the fugitives, and the pressure of the great and small, he plunged his horse into the river. He was nearly drowned, but Shamsu-d din Muhammad Ghaznavi succeeded in extricating him from that destructive element by his skilful efforts and the aid and favour of fortune. In consequence of his excellent service, Shamsu-d din's sons were raised to high and honourable stations.

When, in the meanwhile, Khwája Mu'azzam had conveyed himself as far as the entrance of the Imperial tent, he perceived that the Afgháns were sedulously employed in massacre and plunder, and he could not find an opportunity of rescuing the yeil-covered ladics. Nevertheless, he sacrificed his life in the execution of his master's command. The greater part of the Mughals perished in the river, and an immense number besides fell by the sword; whilst the Afgháns, by the rich beety they captured, had all their wants abundantly supplied. The Imperial censort likewise fell into their hands, with all her establishment.

Constructs new Rohtás.—Its cost.—Khizr Khán governor of Bengal.

Sher Shah threatened to construct such a fort in that country that it should not only effectually restrain the Ghakkars, but also the passage of the Mughals. He therefore himself made a tour through the hills of Girjhak Ninduna [mountains circumjacent], and finding a fit spot, he laid the foundations of the fort, which he called Rohtas.

Besides that, he sent a large force against Ráí Sárang, the Ghakkar, and not only was the country subdued, and the hill of Balnáth plundered, which was then the residence of the Dárogha of that tract, but the daughter of its chiof was taken prisener, and conducted before Sher Shah, who presented her to Khawas Khan; upon which Rái Sárang, they relate, sent a quantity of [homp] blankets and millot to Shor Shah, with the remark that in such only consisted their raiment and food, besides which they could afford nothing; according to others, he sent a lion's skin and seme [arrows] spears, which he said was their only property. With this conduct, however, Shor Shah was by no means satis-Sárang [Sárang's troops] being weakened by [skirmishes] the attacks of the holy warriors, and greatly reduced and straitened, submitted himself in person to Sher Shah, who ordered him to be flayed alive, and his skin to be filled with straw, and so pay the penalty of his misdeeds.

Sher Shah issued farmans to complete the fortifications of Rohtas; but Todar Khatri represented that the Ghakkars, te whom that country belonged, would not allow any one to work for wages; and that they had agreed amongst themselves, upon oath, to expatriate every person that should contravene their wishes. Sher Shah, in answer, told him [that he should noways be allowed to give up that work, which he only wished to do in consequence of his greediness for gold] that the work did not seem to advance under his superintendence, and that a man who was fond of money, and was alarmed about disbursing it, would never accomplish the king's designs. Todar, on the reception of this fresh command, fixed first a golden ashrafi as the enormous remuneration for one stone, which induced the [Kakers] Ghakkars to flock to him in such numbers that afterwards a stone was paid with a rupee, and this pay gradually fell to five tankas, till the fortress was completed.

Sher Sháh, during his stay in the environs of [Tatta] the river Behat, where he amused himself with hunting, received intelligence that Khizr Khán Surk, the governor of Bengal, had married a daughter of Sultán Mahmúd, and [maintained a princely household] sat on the roof of the palace, after the manner of the kings of Bengal, at which disrespectful conduct Sher Sháh was highly displeased.

² From a rupee it fell, after some time, to ten tankas [the black tanka, equal to $\frac{1}{20}$ th rupee], until it reached as low as a Bahloli [= $\frac{1}{40}$ th rupee].—Turkh-i Khdn-Jahán, MS. p. 178. [See Thomas's Chronicles of the Pathan Kings, pp. 360, 366.]

Or

KHONDAMIR.

[This is the last work of the historian Khondamír. It records an event in Zi-l ka'da at the end of 940 m., and the writer died in the following year 941 (1534-5 A.D.).1 The book seems to have received little notice, and remains almost unknown. It is in all probability the same as the Kanan-i Humayani quoted by Abu-l Fazl in the Akbar-nama. It shows that Khondamir had become quite a courtier in his old age, and had abandoned the studies of the historian to become a royal panegryist. His work also shows that he was high in favour at Court, and he gives specimens of odes and verses which ho composed on occasions of royal festivity. He records how various attendants of the Court received titles of honour descriptive of their characters, and that which he received was Amir-i Akhbar, "the noble historian." Notwithstanding the high-flown strain of eulogy in which the work is written, it contains some points of interest, and a few Extracts follow.

Sir H. Elliot did not procure a copy of the MS., and the Editor has had no copy to consult. The Extracts which follow have been selected from what appears to be a complete translation made by Sir H. Elliot's private munshi from a manuscript in the possession of the Asiatic Society of Bengal.]

EXTRACTS.

Origin of this Work.

When this humble and insignificant slave, Ghiyasu-d din, son of Humamu-d din, alias Khondamir,—may God facilitate all difficulties to him!—obtained the honour of meeting this great king, and the rays of royal kindness shone on the surface of his hopes and circumstances, he conceived the desire and entertained the idea in his mind that he would describe, as a memorial for future days, some of the works and inventions of this monarch; because the histories of kings, by means of the black water of ink, which has the effect of the water of life, are immortalized, and the great names and writings of clever authors, by virtue of their praises of celebrated kings, are stamped on the page of time. For instance, the excellencies of Mahmúd were described by 'Utbí and 'Unsurí, and the poems of Mu'izzí and Anwarí celebrated the character of Sanjar.

"Who would remember Hakim Anwari,
Had he not spoken about Sanjar and his works?
Because 'Utbi conferred praises on Mahmud,
Therefore he obtained the object of his desire.
Sharaf was celebrated in the world,
Because he wrote the eulogy of Timur Gurgán."

Although the compiler of this book, on account of his having little knowledge and possessing no ability, withheld his tongue from commencing the history of this renowned monarch's exploits and deeds, and did not allow the pen which possessed two tongues to describe the character of this most prosperous king, yet he always entertained that desire in his faithful heart, and the intention never forsook his mind. One night which was full of light, this insignificant man (the author), having obtained the honour of being present in His Majesty's Court at Gwálior, was ordered to sit down, and the fingers of the generosity of that sun of the heaven of glory opened the gates of kindness to him, and the tongue of that king of kings, who was as dignified as Alexander the Great, pronounced these pleasing words: "It seems proper and desirable that the inventions of my auspicious mind, and the improvements of my enlightened understanding, should be arranged in a series, and written down, in order that in future ages the light of these happy works may shine among the people of countries near and remote." Consequently the writer, who was wishing for a long time that such an order might pass, engaged, like his pen, in writing these very interesting subjects; and having commenced to mention the wonderful inventions, he has imparted eloquence to the pen which possesses two tongues. He hopes that through the favour of the Almighty God, these pages, which contain useful things, will meet the approbation of the most clever characters of the high Court, and that they will view these lines of the book of eloquence with the eye of acceptance, and overlook the mistakes which may have been committed therein by the deficient tongue of the pen.

Accession of Humáyún.

In the beginning of Jumáda-l awwal, A.H. 937, when the King, who was as dignified as Sulaimán, whose seat is now in Paradise, viz. Zahíru-d dín Muhammad Bábar, left the throne of this world for the eternal heaven, the celestial herald of the Supreme Lord raised the pleasing cry, "We made you king on the earth," to the ears of this rightful prince, and the hand of the kindness of the Creator of souls and substances put the happy robe of royalty on the person of this able monarch, the Conqueror of the World.

"The hope which was excited by prosperity is now realized;
The desire which the world entertained is satisfied."

On Friday, the 9th of the said month, in the Jama' masjid at Agra, the khutba was read in the name and title of this noble king, and the noise of congratulations which arose from the crowd of the people reached beyond the heavens.

Auspicious Omens.

Among the other wonderful accidents which happened to the great Nawáb, one was that in the year in which the late king, who was as dignified as Sulaimán and destined to enter paradise, marched with prosperity from Kábul towards Kandahár, he left this sun of the heaven of royalty and power (Humáyún) in trust of the government duties. One day the latter rode on his horse, and went to ramble about in the forest, hills, gardens, and meadows. On the road he wished to take an omen, and having called the great Mauláná, Masíhu-d dín Rúhu-lla, who was his tutor, he told him it had just entered his mind that he should ask any three persons who might first come before him their names, and take an omen from them. The Mauláná said it would be proper if he asked only one man's name; but the King was firm in his resolution. After they had gone a little distance, they saw a man about forty years of age; and on their asking him his name, he replied, "Murád Khwája." After him another person, driving an ass loaded with wood, came before them; and when they inquired of him for his name, he said, "Daulat Khwája." On this it passed from the secret-telling tongue of the King that if the name of the third person who might happen to meet them should be Sa'ádat Khwája, it might be considered a very curious accident; and the star of success, according to the omen, would rise from the horizon of prosperity. At this moment a boy, who was leading cattle to graze; came in sight; and when they asked him what was his name, he answered, "Sa'ádat Khwája." This excited, of course, great wonder and surprise in all the people who accompanied the King, and they were all sure that this prosperous prince would soon, by the Divine assistance, attain the highest pitch of fortune and glory; and the hand of the favour of God would open to him the gates of success in all his sacred and worldly hopes.

Classification of the People.

When the auspicious throne of royalty was filled by this dignified and brave monarch, all the officers of the State and inhabitants of the kingdom were divided into three classes. The brothers and relations of the King, the nobles and ministers, as well as the military men, were called Ahl-i Daulat (officers of the State), because it is evident that—according to the words, "There can be no dominion without men"—no degree of wealth and prosperity can be attained without the assistance of this class of brave and courageous people; and no one can obtain the throne and power without the aid of warriers and heroes.

"Kings, with the assistance of their army,
Place their feet upon the throne of empires.
He alone can obtain wealth and rank
Who is assisted by his army."

The hely persons, the great mushaikhs (religious men), the respectable saiyids, the literati, the law officers, the scientific persons, poets, besides other great and respectable men, formed the second class, and were denominated Ahl-i Sa'ádat (good men), because to observe, honour, and regard these people, and to associate with such men, secures eternal prosperity, and enables men to rise to high dignities and ranks.

"Virtue is the gift of God:

It is not in the power of the mighty man to obtain it.

If you wish to obtain fortune,

You must associate with virtuous men."

Those who possessed beauty and eleganee, those who were young and most lovely, also clever musicians and sweet singers, composed the third class, and the appellation of Ahl-i Murád (people of pleasure) was conferred on them, because most people take great delight in the company of such young-looking men, of rosy cheeks and sweet voices, and are pleased by hearing their songs, and the pleasing sound of the musical instruments, such as the harp, the sackbut, and the lute.

"The hope of the heart of lovers
Is never realized but when they meet persons whose oheeks are rosy.

He who is fond of hearing songs and music

Has the gates of happiness opened for himself."

Apportionment of Time.

According to this classification, the wise King also divided the days of the week, and appointed one day for each of these three Thus, Saturdays and Thursdays were fixed for pious men, and visits were received on these days from literary and religious persons. On these two days the tree of the hope of this estimable body of the people produced the fruit of prosperity by their obtaining audience in the paradise-resembling Court. The reason why these two days were appointed for this class was, that Saturday is ascribed to Saturn, who is the protector of good and religious men and persons of old respectable families; and Thursday is appropriated to Jupiter, who is the preserver of the saiyids, the learned men, and the strict followers of the Muhammadan law. Sundays and Tuesdays were fixed . for the State officers; and all the government business and duties connected with the management of the country were discharged on these days. The King, the destroyer of enemies, sat in the public court, and consequently all the nobles and plebeians were able to obtain the honour of seeing him. The advantage in appointing these two days for opening the Court, and attending to the State affairs was, that Sunday belongs to the Sun, to whom, according to the will of God, is attached the fates of all rulers and kings; and Tuesday is the day of Mars, who is the patron of warriors and brave men. Hence it is evident that to adorn the throne of sovereignty in the public court-hall by his royal sessions on these two days, and to devote himself to the discharge of the government duties, was very proper. Amongst the other customs which were introduced by this just and generous King, and were observed on the days of the sessions, one was, that when he adorned the throne of royalty by sitting on it, drums were beaten, to inform the people, who, immediately on hearing their noise, came to see him; and when he left the Court, the gunners fired guns to let the people know that they might retire. Also on those days the keeper of the wardrobe used to bring some suits of fine apparel, and the treasurer several purses of money, and they placed them in the Court in order that rewards and robes might be given to any one from them, and no delay should take place. Also that several persons who resembled Bahram, having put on coats of mail, and takon blood-drinking swords in their hands, stood before the throno to soize and punish those who might be proved guilty. Mondays and Wednesdays were allotted for pleasure parties, and on these days some of the old companions and chosen friends were convoned, and a band of musicians and singers was called, and they were all satisfied in their wishes. The cause of appointing these days for this purpose was, that Monday is the day of the Moon, and Wednesday of Merenry; and it was therefore reasonable that on these days he should keep company with young men beautiful as the moon, and hear sweet songs and delightful music. On Fridays, as the namo (juma') imports, he called together all the assemblies, and sat with them as long as he found leisure from his other duties.

Symbols of Office.

Another invention of this King was, that he got three arrows of geld made, and called them each after the name of the three classes above mentioned. Each of these was given to one of the most confidential persons of the respective classes, and this person was to manage all the affairs of that class. As long as the man who was entrusted with the arrow conducted the duties attached to him with such care as to insure the pleasure of God and satisfaction of the King, he was maintained in the trust. But when he was intoxicated by the effect of the wine of arrogance and pride, or when his foresight was obscured by the dimness of negligence, and he did not look after his business, but through his misfortune thought only of collecting riches, then the arrow of his wishes failed to hit the point of success, and he was ordered to be removed from office by the pen of destiny for his insolent deeds. * * *

Gradations of Rank.

Among the customs introduced by this King, one was, that of the distribution of arrows, by means of which the distinction of ranks and stations among servants of the throne was marked, The pen of eloquence thus writes a full detail of this particular head. According to the different standards of gold, the ranks of all the people composing the three classes were divided into twelve orders or arrows, and overy one received a grade and rank suitable to himself. The twelfth arrow, which was made of the purest gold, was put in the anspicious quiver of this powerful King, and nobody could dare to touch it. The eleventh arrow belonged to His Majesty's relations and brethren, and all the Sultans who were in the government employ. Tenth, to the great mushaikhs, saiyids, and the learned and religious men. Ninth, to the great nobles. Eighth, to the courtiers and some of the King's personal attendants. Seventh, to the attendants in general. Sixth, to the harems and to the well-behaved female attendants. Fifth, to young maid-servants. Fourth, to the treasurers and stewards. Third, to the soldiers. Second, to the menial servants. First, to the palace guards, camel-drivers, and the like. Each of these arrows or orders had three grades; the highest, the middle, and the lowest.

Government Departments.

Another of the arrangements of this King was, that he divided all the affairs of government into four departments, after the number of the four elements, viz., the Atashi, Hawai, A'bi, and Khaki; and for conducting the business of these departments he appointed four ministers. The department to which belonged the artillery and the making of arms, weapons of war, and various sorts of engines and other such things in which assistance was taken from fire, was called A'tashi; and the superintendence of this department was placed under Khwaja 'Amidu-l Mulk, and the fire of his care inflamed the ovens of the hearts of those; who were employed on these works. The duties connected with the wardrobe, kitchen, stable, and other great and important offices belonged to the Hawai department, and the care of them was entrusted to Khwaja Lutf-ulla. The Sharbat-khána, Súji-khána, the digging of canals, and all the works which related to water and rivers, were comprised in the A'bi department, and its superintendent was Khwaja Hasan. Agriculture, erection of buildings, resumption of Khálisa lands, and some household affairs formed a department which was called Kháki, and this was placed under the management of Khwája Jalálu-d dín Mirzá Beg./ Formerly one of the nobles was ordered to look after each department. For instance, Amír Násir Kulí supervised the fire department, and he always used to put on red clothes. After his death, the cypress of the garden of dignity and grandenr, Mir Nihál, was appointed to the same duty. But in the days when the compiler wrote these pages, the supervision of all the four departments was entrusted to the care of the best of nobles, the most learned man, Amír Wais Muhammad.

Building of Dinpanáh.

Another great work of this just and generous King was the city of Dínpanáh, which was really the asylum of religious men. The musk-resembling pen perfumes the minds of good people by writing an account of its foundation. In the month of Sha'bán, A.H. 939 (1533 A.D.), when the fort of Gwálior was made the object of envy to the high revolving heavens by the royal presence, the great King one night sat there on the Imperial throne, and having ordered all his great courtiers and learned companions to sit down, conversed with them on various topics. In this discourse he poured from his tongue the secrets of the pearls of these words, that long time since it was his intention to found near the capital of Dehlí a large city, the ramparts of which from their loftiness might open the tongue of reproach and scorn at Khawarnak and Sawír, the palaces of Bahrám, and that the keeper of its bastions might claim equality with Saturn. Also that in this city a magnificent palace of seven storeys should be erected, surrounded by delightful gardens and orchards, of such elegance and beauty, that its fame might draw people from the remotest corners of the world for its inspection. That the city should be the asylum of wise and intelligent persons, and be called Dinpanah. Those who were present in the assembly which resembled paradise, opened their tongues in approbation and applause of such a scheme. At the same time, it was discovered by the most witty and clever Mauláná Shahábu-d dín Ahmad Mu'ammaí, that the numerical value of the words Shahr-i pádsháh Dinpanáh was 940, and he said that if the city were built in that year it would be a very remarkable fact. same moment these words were brought to the notice of the King, who, as well as all the officers of the high Court, was greatly struck with them. All persons that were present at the time began to sing with their tongues the following stanza before His Majesty, who understood the excellencies of poetry well:

"The picture which your imagination draws on your mind, Nothing contrary to it is done by the hand of destiny. What your understanding writes on a leaf Agrees with the book of the Will of God."

In short, the King accordingly fixed the resolution in his enlightened mind. After, under the protection of the Almighty God, he had returned from Gwálior to Ágra, he turned the reins of his world-travelling horse, in the beginning of the month of Zí-l hijja, A.H. 939, towards the city of Dehlí. When he had reached the city, which was as beautiful as heaven, safe under the care of God from all evils, and had taken omens and religious advice, a rising ground adjacent to the banks of the stream of Jumna, about three kos from the city, was selected for the foundation of the city of Dínpanáh.

In the middle of the month of the sacred Muharram, A.H. 940, at an hour which was prescribed by the most clever astrologers and the greatest astronomers, all the great mushaikhs (religious men) the respectable saiyids, the learned persons, and all the elders of the city of Dehlí, accompanied the King, who was as generous as the ocean, to the spot, prayed the Almighty God to finish the happy foundation of that city, and to strengthen the basis of the King's wealth. First, His Majesty with his holy hand put a brick on the earth, and then each person from that concourse of great men placed a stone on the ground, and they all made such a crowd there that the army, people, and the artists, masons, and labourers found no room or time to carry stones and mud to the spot. On the same date work was also commenced in the King's own palace.

At this time, i.e. the latter part of the month of Shawwal of the same year, the walls, bastions, ramparts, and the gates of the city of Dinpanah are nearly finished.

TARIKH-I RASHIDI

HAIDAR MIRZA DOGHLAT.

THE writer of this valuable work was the son of Muhammad Husain Mirzá, who was the eldest son of Haidar Mirzá Doghlat, Amir of Kashghar. Muhammad Husain married the younger sister of the Emperor Bábar's mother. So our author, Haidar Mirzá, was first cousin of Bábar, and he seems to have inherited from his mother no small share of that ability and vigour which distinguished his more eminent relative. His father, Muhammad Husain, was put to death at Hirát in 914 (1508 A.D.), under the orders of Shaibání Kháu. Haidar Mirzá himself was also doomed, but he was concealed and saved. In the following year Bábar sent for him to Kábul, and there received him with considerate and generous affection, of which the Mirzá speaks in the warmest terms of gratitude. "It was a sad day," says he, "that deprived me of my father; but, through the unremitting kindness of the Emperor, I never felt the loss. * * During the whole time of my stay with him, he always conducted himself towards me with parental observance and affection."

Haidar Mirzá was as bold and adventurous as Bábar himself, and played a notable part in widely distant places. He was actively engaged as a military leader in Badakhshán and Káshghar, and seems to have there given proofs of eminent military talents. Nor was he at all deficient in that literary ability which distinguished his cousin. He saw much, and he observed and recorded what passed under his own eyes, and what he learnt from diligent inquiry. "The Tārikh-i Rashidi," says

Mr. Erskine, well deserves to be published in the original or translated. It is the production of a learned and accomplished man; and, in the two latter parts, of a contemporary, intimately acquainted with the men and events he describes."

"The history of the Khans of the Mughals, and of the Amírs of Káshghar, subsequent to Tímúr Tughlik Khán, forms the proper subject of the first two books. These details are the more valuable as the succession of the Mughal Khans and of the Amírs of Káshghar from that period is not contained in any other work with which I am acquainted." In the writer's own time, "Central Asia was in a transition state, which ended in the settlement of the Uzbeks in Transoxiana, of the Kirghiz confederacy in Mughalistán, and of the Chaghatáí Turks in The minute details which the author gives of his own India. sufferings, and of the sufferings of his nearest relations, during the period that followed the ascendancy of Shaibání Khán in Máwaráu-n nahr and Khurásán, of their escapes, adventures, successes, and discomfitures, let us more into the condition of the country and feelings of the inhabitants of these states and of Káshghar at that crisis, than perhaps any other monument 'extant. A portion of the last book relates to the history of Kashmir and Hindústán, and the whole work is interspersed with geographical accounts of countries, especially to the east of Máwaráu-n nahr, little known in Europe. The rise and fall of several tribes, or associations of tribes, in the desert, are recorded with much clearness and a perfect acquaintance with their external and internal policy. It would form a most valuable accompaniment to the Commentaries of Bábar, which it illustrates in every page. The two royal cousins are worthy of each other, and do honour to their age."

Haidar Mirzá's notices of India are fragmentary, and are confined to what passed under his own observation; but they give a vivid picture of the disorder and incapacity which marked the early reign of Humáyún, and were the causes of his downfall. In the course of his adventurous life Haidar Mirzá had served in Kashmír, and while he was acting as governor of Lahore on behalf of Prince Kámrán, a number of malcontent nobles of that country endeavoured to obtain his aid in dethroning their unpopular ruler. He entered warmly into the project, but the troubles of Hindústán delayed its execution. After passing into the service of Humáyún, and witnessing the disastrous rout of Kanauj, described in one of the following Extracts, he endeavoured to induce Humáyún to secure a refuge and a vantage-ground in Kashmír. The Emperor was inclined to follow his advice, and sent some forces to enter upon the conquest of that country. But his plans were thwarted by his brother Kámrán, and he was compelled to fly beyond the Indus. Haidar Mirzá soon showed the practicability of the advice he had tendered. With a force of only 4000 men he marched against Kashmír, and evading the troops drawn up to oppose him, he made his way secretly by unfrequented routes to Srinagar the capital, and captured it without opposition in Rajab, 947 (November, 1540). The whole country fell into his possession, and he successfully resisted the attempts of the dethroned prince to recover his kingdom, although Sher Sháh aided the exile. Haidar Mirzá ruled the land which he had won with great wisdom and ability, and so recruited its resources that it was restored to prosperity and happiness. He reigned for eleven years, and was eventually killed in a night attack by a party of conspirators in 958 (1551 A.D.). honour be it recorded, he did not in his prosperity forget his unfortunate kinsman the Emperor Humáyún, but urged him to come to Kashmir, and to make that country a point d'appui for the recovery of his lost empire.

The MS. used is a small 4to. belonging to the Nawab of Jhajjhar, containing 729 pages, of fourteen lines each. There is a transcript of this MS. among Sir H. Elliot's MSS. It seems to differ occasionally from the MS. used by Mr. Erskine, as may be seen by comparing the following Extracts with those given by Mr. Erskine.

Defeat of Humayun at Kanauj.

When all the brothers were assembled, they conferred together upon the state of affairs. The discussion was protracted, but no profitable decision was arrived at; in fact, nothing was proposed that was worthy of the occasion, for as it is said, "When Fortune's adverse, minds are perverse." Kamran Mirza was very anxious to return, but Humayun disregarded all his representations. Seven months were wasted in weary indecision, until the opportunity was lost, and Sher Khán was on the Ganges ready for war. In the midst of this confusion Kamran Mirza became very ill. The climate of Hindústán had brought on some serious disorders.1 When he had thus suffered for two or three months, he lost the use of his hands and feet. As no medicine or treatment relieved him, he became the more desirous of departing to Lahore. At length his maladies so increased, that he made up his mind to return thither. This departure of Kámrán Mirzá was the turning-point in the rise of Sher Khán and the downfall of the Chaghatai power. The Emperor greatly urged him to leave some of his officers and forces as auxiliaries, but Kámrán Mirzá, on the contrary, did all he could to induce all the men of Agra to go away with him, and strenuously rejected the proposal to leave his own army behind. Mír Khwája Kalán, who was his prime minister, also exerted himself to the same purpose. Kámrán Mirzá sent him on in advance, and then followed in person.

While this was passing, Sher Khán advanced to the banks of the Ganges, and passed his army over. Kuth Khán, his son, marched towards Etáwa and Kálpí. These territories were the ikta's of Husain Sultán, who was one of the Uzbek Sultáns, and Yádgár Násir Mirzá, son of Násir Mirzá, the brother of the Emperor Bábar. Part of Kálpí belonged to Kámrán Mirzá, and ho had sent to that district Iskandar Sultán as his representative. These three persons marched against Kuth Khán, who was slain in the battle, and they gained a complete victory. The Emperor now marched from Agra towards the Ganges against Sher Khán. [The writer goes on to explain at length his reasons for leaving Kamran, and joining the Emperor.] Although Mirzá Kámrán would not consent to my parting from him, I remained behind without his consent. Kámrán Mirzá himself, shamefully leaving only Iskandar Sultán with about 1000 men as auxiliaries, went off to Lahore, taking with him all the men of Agra he could carry with him; thus giving strength to the enemy and preparing defeat for his friends. The Imperial army reached the banks of the Ganges in the best way that it There it encamped and lay for about a month, the Emperor being on one side of the river, and Sher Khán on the other, facing each other. The armies may have amounted to more than 200,000 men. Muhammad Sultán Mirzá, of the house of Timúr, and grandson by a daughter of Sultán Husain (of Khurásán), had come to India to wait upon the Emperor Bábar, and had been received with every mark of kindness and kingly favour. After Bábar's death he had several times revolted against Humáyún; but being unsuccessful, he had sought forgiveness, and had been pardoned. Now having colluded with Sher Khán, he deserted. A new way was thus opened. Everybody began to desert, and the most surprising part of it was, that many of those who deserted did not go over to Sher Khán, and so could expect no favour from him. A heated feeling ran through the army, and the cry was, "Let us go and rest in our own homes," A number also of Kámrán's auxiliary forces deserted and fled to Lahore.

Among the equipments which were in the train of the Emperor were 700 carriages (gardún), each dawn by four pairs of bullocks, and carrying a swivel (zarb-zan), which discharged a ball (kalola), of 500 miskáls weight. I myself several times saw that from the top of an eminence they unfailingly (be-khatá) struck horsemen who slightly and unsuspectingly exposed themselves. And there were twenty-one carriages, each drawn by eight pairs of bullocks. Stone balls were of no use in these, but the shots were of molten brass, and weighed 5000 miskáls, and the cost of each was 200 miskáls of silver. They would strike anything that was visible at the distance of a parasang.

As the army had taken to desert, it was judged better to risk a battle than to see it go to rain without fighting. If the result was unfavourable, in that case we could not at least be accused of having abandoned an empire like Hindústán without striking a blow. Another consideration was, that if we passed the river, desertion would be no longer possible. We therefore crossed over.

Both armies entrenched themselves. Every day skirmishes occurred between the adventurous swaggering spirits of both sides. These proceedings were put an end to by the monsoon rains, which came on and flooded the ground, rendering it unfit for a camp. To move was indispensable. Opinions were expressed that another such a deluge would sink the whole army in the abyss of despair, and it was proposed to move to a rising ground which the inundation could not reach, and which lay in front of the enemy. I went to reconnoitre, and found a place suitable for the purpose. I said that we would on the morrow try the enemy on the touchstone of experience, for he ought not to attack while we were on the march, as the arraying of an army at the time of marching is contrary to sound judgment.1 The morrow was the 10th of Muharram, and we must keep our forces well under control until we see if the enemy comes out of his trenches and advances against us. Then at last a regular pitched battle will be fought between us. The proper plan for us is to place the mortars (deg) and swivels (zarb-zan) in front; and the gunners, nearly 5000 in number, must be stationed with the guns. If he does come out to attack us, there is no time or place more suitable than this for battle. If he does not come out of his entreuchments, we must remain drawn up till about mid-day, and then return to our position. Next day we must act just in the same way. Then the baggage must move to the new position, and we must follow and occupy the place. This scheme of mine met with general approbation.

On the 10th Muharram, 948 n., we mounted to carry the plan into effect, and formed our array. As had been determined, the carriages (gordûn) and mortars (dep) and small guns (topskehiyan) were placed in the centre. The command of the gans was given to Muhammad Khán Rúmí, the sous of Ustád 'Ali Kulí, Ustád Ahmad Rúmi, and Husain Khalifa. They placed the carriages and mortars (deg) in their proper positions, and stretched chains between them. In other divisions there were amirs of no repute, men who were amirs only in name. They had got possession of the country, but they had not a fincture of prudence or knowledge, or energy or cumulation, or nobility of mind or generosity -qualities from which nobility draws its name. The Emperor had posted the author of this work upon his left, so that his right flank should be on the Emperor's left. In the same position he had placed a force of chosen troops. On my left, all my retainers were stationed. I had 400 chosen men, inured to warfare and familiar with battle, fifty of whom were mounted on horses accounted with armour. Between me and the river (júl-bár) there was a force of twenty-seven amira, all of whom carried the tigh banner. In this position, also, were the other components of the left wing, and they must be judged of by the others. On the day of battle, when Sher Khku, having formed his divisions, marched out, of all these twenty-ceven tigh banners not one was to be seen, for the great noble charl hidden them in the apprehension that the enemy might selvance upon them. The soldiership and bravery of the amira may be constited first this exhibition of courage.

Sher Khan came out in five distribute of 11thty men exin advance of him (peshtar i o) were 3000 men. I estimated the whole as being less than 15,000, but I calculated the Chaghatáí force as about 40,000, all mounted on tipchak horses, and clad in iron armour. They surged like the waves of the sea, but the courage of the amirs and officers of the army was such as I have described. When Sher Khan's army came out of its entrenchments, two divisions (jauk), which seemed to be equal to four divisions, drew up in that place, and three divisions advanced against their opponents. On our side I was leading the centre, to take up the position which I had selected; but when we reached the ground, we were unable to occupy it: for every amir and wazir in the Chaghathi army, whether he be rich or poor, has his ghulams. An amir of note with his 100 retainers and followers has 500 servants and ghulams, who in the day of battle render no assistance to their master and have no control over thomselves. So in whatever place there was a conflict, the gluliums were entirely ungovernable. When they lest their masters, they were seized with panie, and blindly rushed about in terror.1 In short it was impossible to held our ground. They so pressed upon us in the rear, that they dreve the centre upon the chains stretched between the chariots, and they and the soldiors dashod each other upon them. Those who were behind so pressed upon those who were in front, that they broke through the chains. The men who were posted by the chains were driven beyond it, and the few who remained behind were breken, se that all formation was destroyed.

Such was the state of the centre. On the right Sher Khán advanced in battle array; but before an arrow was discharged, the camp followers fled like chaff before the wind, and breaking the line they all pressed towards the centre. The ghulams whem the commanders had sent to the front rushed to the lines of chariots, the whole array was broken, and the mir was separated from his men, and the men from the mir. While the centre was thus thrown into disorder, all the fugitives from the right bore down upon it. So before the enemy had discharged any arrow, the whole army was scattered and defeated. I had estimated the Chaghatáí army as numbering 40,000 men, excluding the camp followers (ghulám) and workmen (shágird-pesha). They fled before 10,000 men, and Sher Khán gained a victory, and the Chaghatáís were defeated in this battle-field where not a man, either friend or foe, was wounded. Not a gun was fired, and the chariots (gardún) were useless.

When the Chaghatáis took to flight, the distance between their position and the Ganges might be nearly a parasang. the amirs and braves (bahádurán) fled for safety to the river, without a man of them having received a wound. The enemy pursued them, and the Chaghatáís, having no time to throw off their armour and coats, plunged into the river. The breadth of the river might be about five bowshots. Many illustrious amirs were drowned, and each one remained or went on at his will. When we came out of the river, His Majesty, who at mid-day had 17,000 workmen in attendance upon his Court, was mounted upon a horse which had been given to him by Tardi Beg, and had nothing on his head or feet. "Permanence is from God, and dominion is from God." Out of 1000 retainers, eight persons came out of the river; the rest had perished in the The total loss may be estimated from this fact. When we reached Agra, we made no tarry, but, broken and dispirited, in a state heart-rending to relate, we went on to Lahore. On the new moon of Rabi'u-l awwal, 947 H., the princes, amirs, and people had drawn together at Lahore. The throng was so great that it was difficult to move about, and still more difficult to find a lodging. Every one acted as his fears or his interests led him.]

JAUHAR.

These are the private Memoirs of the Emperor Humáyún written by his aftabehi, or ewer-bearer, Jauliar. They have been translated into English by Major Stewart, and published by the Oriental Translation Fund Lond. (1832). [The MS. used by Stewart boro the above title, under which the work has become generally known, but in Sir H. Elliot's copy of the MS. the author is made to name the work Humáyún Sháhí. It is also called Tarikh-i Humayan. These Memoirs afford much amusement from the naïve and simple style in which they are written. author was a constant attendant upon the Emperor, both during his adversities and successes, and is so devoted an admirer of his patron, that he rarely sees anything to reproach in his conduct. He gives the most trivial details with the utmost candour and gravity, thinking nothing too insignificant, to relate of so great an Emperor. "Let no one," says Dion, after recording (lib. lxxii. 18, 18) some of the public exposures and debaucheries of Commodus-"Let no one reprove me for degrading the importance of history because I write such things. In another case I would not have written them; but since they were done by an Emperor, and I myself saw and heard them, I thought it right to conceal nothing, and to transmit these matters for the information of posterity, as if they had been of the utmost consequence."

Of himself Jauhar says, "I was at all times, and in all stations, in constant attendance on the royal person; it therefore occurred to me as desirable that I should write a narrative of all the events to which I had been an eye-witness, that it may remain as a record of the past interesting occurrences. I have endeavoured to explain them to the best of my humble ability, although in a style very inferior to the dignity of the subject. I commenced this work in the year 995 (A.D. 1587), and have named it the Tazkiratu-l Waki'at, 'Relation of Occurrences.', It is not my intention to narrate all the occurrences, which have taken place during the late reign, but I shall confine myself to those operations in which His Majesty was personally concerned. I shall therefore commence this work with Humáyun's ascending the throne, and shall conclude with his return from Persia and his regaining the sovereignty. A shall further explain with what fortitude and perseverance the Emperor encountered so many hardships and difficulties, and through the throur of the Almighty God, thereby recovered his dominions, in the here that this book may band down the name of the author to nestrin, and inform marking of these emecationary 5 45.025 "

138 JAUHAR.

When Humáyún recovered Lahore, he immediately divided the appointments of the province among his adherents, and Jauhar was appointed collector of the village of Haibatpúr. Before he departed, the King told him a familiar story as a warning against extortion. Jauhar made a courtly reply, and proceeded to his charge. Upon arriving in the district, he V found that it had been the custom of the Afghán farmers to give their wives or children in pledge to the Hindú bankers for money advanced on account of the collections. (Therefore, the first thing he did was to collect all the grain that had been hidden in dry pits, and having sold it, he paid the bankers and liberated the families of the peasants. On hearing of this affair, His Majesty was much pleased, and promoted him to the eollectorship of the villages belonging to the Afghan ehief, Tatar Khán Lodí. Soon after he had an opportunity of displaying his energy and determination. The Panjáb having been left without troops, in consequence of Humáyún's onward march, a body of 400 Afghans entered the province of Lahore, and began to plunder. (The collectors met to consult, and by Jauhar's advice they collected all the men they could, and placing themselves under the command of a brave and active young man, they fell upon 'tem by surprise, defeated them, and took five of their chiefs pr. oners.) Jauhar does not tell us what position he held when he wrote his Memoirs, but it is evident that he became a man of some mark. Abú-l Fazl mer. tions his appointment to the district of Haibatpur, and subsequently speaks of him as "Mihtar Jauhar, treasurer of the Panjáb."]

Humáyún's conquest of Chunár.

His Majesty then inquired from his ministers and nobles what intelligence there was of Sher Khán Afghán, where he was, what he was doing, and what he was intent upon? He was informed that Sher Khán had taken the fart of Robtics and Bahrkunda, that he had been for some time besieging the capital of Bengal, and was upon the point of taking it. Upon hearing this untoward news, His Majesty exclaimed to his nobles, @ To what a pitch the daring of these Afghans has reached; pleaso God, we will to-morrow march to the fort of Chunar." /) His Majesty then questioned Rúmi Khán as to the powers of resistance of the fortress, and he replied that by the Emperor's good fortune, and the favour of the Almighty, they would take the fortress by force. Therenpon the Imperial forces marched towards Chimár, and on the Shab-i barát they came to five kos distance from the fort. The engineer (Rúmí Khúu) then debated with himself how he could find out the exact condition of the fortress, what bastion he ought to attack, and on which side he should mine. He had a slave named Khalifat, whom in furtherance of his plan he so flogged that the weals were visible upon his body. He then directed him to go into the fortress, and say that he was the slave of Rúmí Khún, and that his master had so beaten him without any cause that he had fled and sought protection with them. So he was to find out the particulars of the fortress and return.) , He acted in accordance with these instructions., When the Afghans saw his condition, and the marks of the chastisement plainly visible on his body, they believed him, and strove to heal his wounds. One day the slave proposed to the Afghans, that if they saw no objection they should show him the defences of the fortress, and he would advise as to the best means of resisting the guns which Rúmi Khán had planted, so that the garrison might be safe. The Afghins complied with this proposition, After staying a few days in the fortress, and making his observations, the slave made his escape, and returned to his master, whom he acquainted with the exact condition of the fortress, He advised him to attack the bastion on the river-side, and to construct a mine on that Růmí Khán brought up his guns, and battere? same side. that bastion, and he placed other batteries under his raffic officers. * *

Rúmí Khán then sought His Majcsty's permission to construct a floating battery, by means of which he proposed to cut the garrison off from the water, and prevent them from being able to maintain life. The royal order was given for him to do what he deemed expedient. Under this authority he employed himself for six months in constructing a battery upon three boats, so high that on the top of it all the soldiers of the garrison were plainly discernible. When it was completed, he sought the royal authority to move his battery, make it fast to the fortress, and carry the place by storm. Permission being given, tho attack was kept up till mid-day, and the royal army lost nearly 700 men. For all their efforts they could not take the place, and the garrison by their fire smashed one portion of tho battery.1 Noxt morning Rúmí Khán again prepared his battery. The Afghans saw that the assailants were resolute and vigorous, and that the place must soon fall, so they proposed to capitulate. Under His Majesty's command the garrison marched out, and the royal forces took possession of the fortress. Rúmí Khán, being very irate and furious, cut off both hands of 300 gunnors and others who had formed part of the garrison. When His Majesty was informed of this, he was very angry with Rúmí Khán, and declared that no injury ought to be inflicted on men who had surrondered. After the capture of the fort a grand banquet was given and great rejoicings were made; rewards were distributed and great honours were bestowed. Majesty then asked Rúmí Khán as to the fortress and to the way he would deal with it. The Khan replied, that if the place were in his hands he would not allow a Bengálí to approach within a kos of it. And upon His Majesty asking who ought to be placed in command of it, he replied, that he knew of no one fit for the position but Beg Mirak. Upon this advice His Majesty placed Beg Mírak in command of the fortress. This counsel so incensed all the nobles against Rúmí Khán, that they conspired against him, and caused poison to be placed in his cup, so that he died.

Humayun in Bengal.1

The King moved forward with the whole army, and in four days with little difficulty took possession of Gaur, the capital of Bengal, and drove away all the Afgháns. After cleansing and repairing the city, the first act of His Majesty was to divide the province into jūghrs among his officers; after which he very unaccountably shut himself up in his harem, and abandoned himself to every kind of indulgence and luxury. While the King had thus for several months given himself up to pleasure and indolence, information was at length conveyed to him that Sher Khán had killed 700 Mughals, had laid siege to the fortress of Chunar, and taken the city of Benstee; and had also sent forward an army along the bank of the Gaugest to take Kanauj; that he had further seized the families of several of the officers, and sent them prisoners to Robitss.

*Defeat of Humayan at Chapanghat?

As soon as the peace was concluded, the treacheron. Shor Khan summoned his principal officers and said to them, "Is there any of you brave enough to go and storm the Mughai camp?" At first not one of the Africa officers would not be take the task. At length a per- a called Khanas Khanas said. to the driver to bring the elephant to him, who did so. He then mounted, and asked a cunuch who was in the hourdah, what was his name. He replied, "Kafür." His Majesty then ordered the driver to carry him across the river, but the fellow refused, and said the elephant would be drowned. On which the onnucli whispered, that he suspected the driver wished to carry them over to the enemy; it would therefore be advisable to take off the fellow's head. The King said, "How shall we then make the elephant cross the river?" The cunuch replied, that he understood something of driving an elephant. Upon hearing this, His Majesty drew his sword and so wounded the driver that he fell off into the water, and the cunnch stepped down from the howdah on the neck of the animal, and caused him to pass the river. His Majesty further related, that when he arrived near the bank, it was so steep that he could not find a place to ascend. At length, some of the camp colour-men, who were on the look out for him, tied their turbans together, and throwing an end of the cloth to him, he with some difficulty climbed up. They then brought him a horse, on which he mounted and proceeded towards Agra. * * *

The King having been joined by the Princes Hindál and 'Askarí and the Mirzás Yúdgár Násir, etc., proceeded joyfully towards Ágra. When they reached the village of Bhain-gánw, the peasants, who were in the habit of plundering a defeated army, stopped up the read, and one of them wounded Mirzá Yúdgár with an arrow. On which the Mirzá said to the Prince 'Askarí, "Do you go on and punish these villagers, while I stop to dress my wound." The Prince was displeased at this request, and gave the Mirzá some abuse, on which the other retorted in harsher language, and the Prince struck him three times with his horsewhip, which was returned with interest on the other side. When intelligence of this unpleasant fracas reached the King, he said, "They had better have vented their spite on the robbers than on each other. What has happened cannot be recalled, but let us hear no more of it." In short, the King reached Agra in safety.

One of the scoundrels of the enemy approached the King, and struck him on the head with his sword, and was about to repeat the blow, when His Majesty, looking at him, said, "You wretch, how dare you?"—upon which the fellow desisted; and some other officer: coming up, led the King out of the battle; but he was so severely wounded, that he became weak from loss of blood, and therefore threw off his jabba (quilted coat), and gave it in charge of an Abyssinian servant; but his servant being obliged to make his escape from the battle, threw away the jabba, which having been found by some of Kámrán's followers, it was brought to the Prince, who immediately proclaimed that the King was killed.

At this time there only remained with His Majesty eleven persons, including servants, and the author of these pages. We therefore took him out of the battle; and as his own horse was unquiet, we mounted him on a small ambling steed, two of the chiefs supporting him on either side, and endeavouring to console him by anecdotes of former princes who had suffered similar adversity, and encouraged him to exert himself, as it was probable the enemy might pursue him. On hearing this, he resumed his fortitude, and proceeded towards the pass of Sirtun. On the march we were joined by some of the chiefs, and at nightfall reached the entrance of Sirtun. As it was then very cold, and His Majesty suffered much from weakness, a sheepskin clock was brought and put on him.

In the morning we reached the top of the pass; and as it was then getting warm, the King dismounted on the bank of the river, performed his ablutions, and washed his wound; but as there was no carpet for prayer to be found, the humble servant, Janhar, brought the cover of a stool of scarlet cloth, a topread 146

it for His Majesty, who knelt thereon, and performed his devotions, and sat down facing the kibla (Mecca). * * *

The King again mounted, and rode on to Parwan, where he alighted. At this place the only tent that could be procured was a small shamiyana (canopy), sufficient only to screen one person; under this His Majesty lay down and slept. In the morning the author of these pages awoke His Majesty, and told him it was the hour of morning prayer. He said, "My boy, as I am so severely wounded, I cannot bear to purify myself with cold water." I represented that I had got some warm water ready for him; he then arose, performed his ablutions, and said his prayers. He afterwards mounted his horse, but had not ridden far when he complained that the clotted blood on his clothes hurt him, and asked of the servants if they had no jama (coat) they could lend him. Bahádur Khán replied, he "had a jáma, but it was one His Majesty had discarded and given to him, and he had worn it." The King said, "Never mind that, bring it." He then put it on, and gave the dress which was stained with blood to this humble servant, Jauhar, the áftábchi, and said, "Take care of this dress, and only wear it on holy days."

From Parwán we proceeded to Kahamrúd, where Táhir Muhammad had the honour of paying his respects. He had pitched an old tent for the King, and had prepartainment for him; but the blockhead did not bring any present, not even a spare dress. His Majesty ordered his followers to partake of the dinner, but went himself to the edge of a fountain, where they pitched an old tent, grimed with smoke and soot, for him; but as there was no necessary tent, the humble servant went and procured two hurdles, which he fixed up as a privy. At this time an old woman came and offered His Majesty a pair of silk trousers. He said, "Although these are not proper for a man to wear, yet, as my own are defiled with blood, I will put them on." He then inquired what the woman had for her support; and on being informed, wrote an order to the collector not to demand any tribute from her in future.

Surrender of Kåbul to Kåmvån.

When His Majesty left Kábnl, he bestowed the government on Kásim 'Alí, who had formerly been a servant of Kámrán's; but notwithstanding this circumstance, he for some time refused to give up the fortress, till assured by Kámrán that the King was dead, who in proof thereof produced the jabba or quilted coat; in consequence of which the Princo was allowed to enter the fort, and again took possession of the young Akbar. * * After remaining a month and twenty days at Andaráb, * * the King determined on mareling to oppose the rebels; but he first assembled all his chiefs, and proposed to them to take the oath of allegiance. Hájí Muhammad Khán said, "It was also incumbent on His Majesty to take the oath of confederacy." The Prince Hindal said, "Such a proceeding was highly improper." But the King said, "If the chiefs wished it, he would take the oath to satisfy them." In short, the oaths were ratified on both sides; and, to give the ceremony more solemnity, the King fasted all that day.

Kämrán surrendered by the Gakhars, and blinded.2

The King received letters from Sultán Adam, chief of the Gakhars, stating that "the Prince Kámrán was now in his torritory, and that if His Majesty would take the trouble of coming there, he would give him up." * * * The Prince arrived, and advanced with great humility. The King, however, received him graciously, and pointed to him to sit down on the bed on his right hand. His Majesty then sat down on the bed also, having the young Prince Akbar on his left hand. Sultán Adam, 'Abdu-l Ma'álí, and the other chiefs were also seated in due order. After some time, His Majesty called for a water-melon, one-third of which he took and divided with his brother. * * * Preparations having been made for an entertainment, the whole night was passed in jollity and carousing. * * * [Four days after], the business of Mirzá Kámrán was taken into consideration, and it was resolved, in the first place, to remove all his servants from him. Then the King ordered five of his own people [names], and his humble servant Jauhar, to attend upon the Prince, and he said to me, "My boy (ghulám), do you know where you are sent?" I said, "Yes, and I know Your Majesty's (wishes)." He replied, "Your business is to take care of the interior of the tent, you are desired not to sleep for a moment." * * *

Early in the morning the King marched towards Hindústán, but before his departure determined that the Prince should be blinded, and gave orders accordingly; but the attendants on the Prince disputed among themselves who was to perform the cruel act. Sultán 'Alí, the paymaster, ordered 'Alí Dost to do it. The other replied, "You will not pay a Shah-Rukhi (3s. 6d.) to any person without the King's directions; therefore, why should I commit this deed without a personal order from His Majesty? Perhaps to-morrow the King may say, 'Why did you put out the eyes of my brother?' What answer could I give? Depend upon it I will not do it by your order." Thus they continued to quarrel for some time. At length, I said, "I will go and inform the King." On which I with two others galloped after His Majesty. When we came up with him, 'Ali Dost said, in the Chaghatáí Turkí language, "No one will perform the business." The King replied in the same language, abused him, and said, "Why don't you do it yourself?"

After receiving this command, we returned to the Prince, and Ghulám 'Alí represented to him, in a respectful and condoling manner, that he had received positive orders to blind him. The Prince replied, 'LI would rather you would at once kill me." Ghulám 'Alí said, "We dare not exceed our orders." He then twisted a handkerchief up as a ball for thrusting into the mouth, and he with the farásh seizing the Prince by the hands, pulled him out of the tent, laid him down, and thrust a lancet into his eyes (such was the will of God).) This they repeated at least fifty times; but he bore the torture in a manly manner, and did not utter a single groan, except when one of the men who was sitting on his knees pressed him. He then said, "Why do you sit upon my knees? What is the uso of adding to my pain?" This was all he said, and he acted with great courages till they squeezed some (lemon) inice and salt into the sockets of his eyes. He then could not forbear, and called out, "O Lord, O Lord, my God, whatever sins I may have committed have been amply punished in this world, have compassion upon me in the next.") * * The author of these pages, seeing the Prince in such pain and distress, could no longer remain with him. I therefore went to my own tent, and sat down in a very melancholy mood. The King having seen me, sent Ján Muhammad, the librarian, to ask me, "If the business I had been employed on was finished, and why I had returned without orders?" The humble servant represented that "the business I had been sent on was quite completed." His Majesty then said, "Ho need not go back, let him get the water ready for me to bathe."]

XXXIX.

TARIKH-I ALFI

OP

MAULANA AHMAD, AND OTHERS.

This work comprehends a History of Muhammadan nations up to the thousandth year of the Hijra era. It is from this circumstance that it obtains its name, Alf signifying in the Arabic language one thousand. The Emperor Akbar directed its compilation by several learned men, and may have perhaps fixed upon this particular period of one thousand years, in conformity with a notion he is said to have entertained and expressed, that the Muhammadan religion would be abolished, after lasting that period.

At the commencement of the work, many different authors were employed, but, subsequently, the chief labour devolved upon Mauláná Ahmad, the son of the Kází of Thatta,³ and the author of Khulásatu-l Hayát, "the Essence of Life." An interesting account of the different parties engaged on it is given by 'Abdu-l Kádir Badáúní in the following passage from his Muntakhabu-t Tawárikh.

- "About this time (A.H. 990), Mullá Ahmad, of Thatta, a bigot, who had the impertinence to call himself a physician,

 - ² Troyer and Shea, Dabistan, vol. iii., p. 98.
- ³ His birthplace is differently given by others. Dr. Bird calls him son of Nasralland of Nineveh. General Briggs calls him Mulla Ahmad of Nineveh. See History of Guzerat, p. 88. Firishta, vol. i., p. xlix. Dabistan, vol. ii., p. 160.
- A The author of the Ma-dsiru-l Umard, who was himself a Shi'a, speaks more tenderly of these absurdities. He says the Mulla was partial to religious controversy, and rarely missed an opportunity of indulging his propensity, even in mixed societies.

came from the Dekhin, and was presented at Court. His aneestors, who resided in Sind, wero Farúkis of the Hanífalı sect, and Mullá Ahmad used, in consequence of his apostacy, to shower anathemas upon those unfortunato persons. * * * In the time of Shah Tahmasp he associated in Irak with some heretic Iranians, but he even exceeded them, notwithstanding their notorious heresy. When Shah Ism'ail II. deserted the faith of his father, and became a Sunní, and persecuted the heretic Shi'as, Mullá Ahmad accompanied Makhdúm Sharkí (an uncompromising Sunní, who wrote the Kitábu-n Naváfiz) on a pilgrimage to Mecca. Thenco he proceeded to the Dekhin, and afterwards to Hindústán, and finding no opposition to the prosecution of his designs, he began to teach his absurd doctrines,1 and invite converts to the Shi'a persuasion; but in a short time he met the penalty of his evil deeds. He had as yet had no interview with Shaikh Faízí, and had not yet assumed that air of confidence, with which his intimacy with that minister inspired him, when I saw him one day in the bázár, where some 'Irákis took the opportunity of mentioning my name to him in terms of praise. Upon this, he addressed me, and said, 'I see the mark of a Shi'a stamped on your forehead.' 'Just as much,' I replied, 'as I see Sunni stamped upon yours.' The bystanders laughed, and were much gratified at the retort. shall, please God! notice the close of his life in the proper place."

"The year 1000 of the Hijra era, which is in general use, being now completed, the Emperor Akbar ordered a history to be written of all the Muhammadan kings, and directed that such a name should be given to the work as to denote the year of its composition. It was for this reason that the work was entitled Alfi. He further ordered the word Rihlat (death) to be substituted for Hijra (flight) in the different dates, and employed seven persons to undertake the compilation from the date of the decease of the Prophet to the present day, and to mention therein the events of the whole world."

² This is said in the paulo-post future sense, because the order for the composition of the Tarikh-i Alfi is recorded as one of the events of 990 m., and we find 'Abdu-l Kadir going to Lahoro to revise it in 1000 m. The translation of the Mahdbharziz was also ordered in 990 m.

"He assigned the first year to Nakib Khán, the second to Sháh Fath-ulla, and so on to Hakim Humám. Hakim 'Alí, Hájí Ibráhím Sirhindí (who had just then arrived from Gujarát), Mirzá Nizámu-d dín, and myself; so that by snch distribution thirty-five years were finished in the conrse of a week."

"During the period that I was compiling the events of the seventh year, and was engaged on the life of Khalif 'Umar, the model of purity (may God be propitious to him!), I had just completed an account of the foundation of Kúfa, and the destruction of Madá-ín, from the ruins of which the new city was embellished, and the marriage of Ammi Kulsúm, the daughter of the Amiru-l muminin 'Ali' (may God be propitious to him!), as well as the institution of five stated times for prayer, the fall of the city of Nasibin, and the large black scorpions which were made use of to effect its capture, when, one night, Mírzá J'afar Asaf Khán thought proper to dispute the correctness of these facts.2 Notwithstanding this, Shaikh Abú-l Fazl and Ghází Khán Badakhshí confirmed my assertions. Shortly afterwards, when I was asked whence I got this information, I replied that I had seen it in books, and had written accordingly, and that it was not my own invention. Immediately the Rauzatu-I Abbab and other historical books were called for from the library, and given to Nakib Khan to verify the accuracy of the statement, which, by God's grace, being found correct, I was relieved from the charge of invention."

"At the recommendation of Hakim Abú-l Fath, the compilation of the work from the thirty-sixth year was entrusted solely to Mullá Ahmad of Thatta, who, howover, wroto whatover coincided with his sectarian prejudices—a fact which is well known. The compilation of two volumes was finished up to the time of Changíz Khán, when Mirzá Fúlád, one night, pretending that the King had sent for Mullá Ahmad, summoned him from his house, and murdered him in a street of Lahore, in revenge for some injury which he had suffered at his hands, as well as because he was violently opposed to him in matters of religion. For this act he was sentenced to death."

"The remainder of the work was written by Asaf Khán, up to the year 997 1 n. In the year 1000 m. I was ordered to proceed to Lahore, to revise the composition, to compare it with other histories, and to arrange the dates in their proper sequence. I compared the first two volumes in one year, and entrusted the third to Asaf Khán."

In another part of his History (A.H. 1003), 'Abdu-l Kúdir again speaks of the Tärikh-i Alfi being divided into three books, two composed by Mullá Ahmad, "the heretie, may he meet with his deserts!" and the third by Asaf Khán (J'afar Bog). Major C. Stewart, however, in his Catalogue of Típú Sultán's Library,

^{· 1} Not having seen the last part of the History, I am not able to ascertain whether it extends only to 997 u. The Ma-deiru-l Umard uses the same expression. Bird's Guzerat, p. 88, says it was completed in 995 u. The Hyderabad copy goes to 974 of the Rihlat, and a copy belonging to Wilayat Husain goes to 984 of Rihlat or 994 u.

² In another portion of his History ho says, that he presented the first volume of the edition, which had been revised by him, in the 39th year of the reign, corresponding with A.M. 1003, in which labour, his friend, Mulla Mustafa, a famous copyist of Lahore, had been associated with him. He was then asked by Akbar to revise the second, as it was full of the religious opinions of Mulla Ahmad, but he excused himself from doing more than merely revising the style, without altering the sense, or correcting the dates; in order that his enomies might not say he had been introducing his own sentiments instead of those of the author, and substituting one set of prejudices for another. As the Turikh-i Alfi is quoted in the Tabakdt-i Akbari, which is brought down only to the end of the 38th year of the reign, corresponding with 1002 m., it is evident it must have been available before 'Abdu-! Kūdir had revised it.

says it is divided into five books, and that it extends from A.D. 622 to 1592. The error of making it commence from A.D. 622 arises from his supposing that its dates refer to the Flight, instead of the Death, of Muhammad [making a difference of ten years and two months]. This alteration of a universal era, and the substitution of one especially for this work, is a very objectionable feature of the Tärikh-i Alfi, excellent as it is in many other respects.

It will be observed that 'Abdu-l Kádir promised to relate further particulars of Mullá Ahmad in their proper place, and he fulfils that promise in the following passage, which affords as amusing an instance of odium theologicum as is to be met with in any country.

"During this month (Safar, 996 A.H.) Mirzá Fúlád Birlás persuaded the horetic Mullá Ahmad, who was always openly reviling the first Khalifs, to leave his own house at midnight under some pretence, and then assassinated him. The chronograms of which event are, 'Bravo! Fúlád's stilette!' and 'Hollish hog!' and indeed when I saw that dog in the agenies of death, I observed his countenance to be exactly like that of a hog: others also observed the same. (May God protect me from such a dreadful fate!) Mirzá Fúlád, was bound alive to the leg of an elephant in the city of Lahore, and thus attained martyrdom.

"When Hakim Abú-l Fath sent some one to inquire of him, whether sectarian prejudices had induced him to kill Mullá Ahmad, he replied that had that been the reason, he would have selected a more noble victim than the Mullá. The Hakim reported this speech to the King, who remarked that Mirzá Fúlád was an implacable villain, and ought to suffer death. He therefore ordered him to be drawn, while yet living, by an elephant, although he was very nearly obtaining a pardon through the intercession of the ladies 1 of the royal household. The Mullá expired three or four days after the Mirzá.

"It is said, that when the Shi'as were bathing the Mulla previous to burial, they fixed, according to the observances of their religion, a tent peg in his back, and dipped him several times in the river, and that when he was buried, Shaikh Faizi and Shaikh 'Abú-l Fazl appointed watchmen to guard his tomb; notwithstanding which, when the Court departed for Kashmir, the people of Lahore disinterred his vilo carcase, and burnt it."

The author of the Ma-asiru-1 Umara adds a few particulars respecting Mullá Ahmad, in his biography of Fúlád Khán. He says that the accomplice of Mirzá Fúlád personated one of the royal messengers, and summoned the Mullá to the King's presence; that when the Mullá had left his honse, he was attacked, and had one of his hands ent off by a sword; that the assassins, mistaking it for his head, ran off, satisfied that their work was accomplished; that he fell from his herse, and when he had recovered a little, picked up his own hand, and went to the house of Hakím Hasan for succour; that when Fúlád Khán was seized, he confessed the crime before Abú-l Fazl, Khán-khánán, and Asaf Kkán.

He says also that Mullá Alimad went in his twenty-second year to Meshhed, and thence to Yezd and Shíráz, where, under the instructions of the physicians Kamálu-d dín Husain and Mullá Mirzá Ján, he entered on a course of medical study, and read the Kulyát-i Kánún of Avicenna, and the Sharh-i Tajrid, with all the commentaries. He then went to Kazwín, where he had an interview with Sháh Tahmásp, and when Sháh Ism'áíl the Second was converted to the Sunní doctrine, he went to 'Irák-i 'Arab and Meeca, and after mixing with several celebrated scholars in those parts, proceeded to the Dekhin, to the Court of Kutb Sháh of Golconda, and in the twenty-seventh year of Akbar's reign came to Fathpúr Síkrí, where he received orders to compile the Tárikh-i Alfi.

He used to read out his composition to Akbar, who asked him upon one occasion, why he had dwelt so long upon Khalifa 'Usman's reign. He replied openly, says the Ma-asiru-l Umara, before all the Turani nobles, who were Sunnis, that that period is the "Rausatu-s Shuhada" of the Sunnis, and to abridge it would give offence.

The inconvenience respecting the introduction of a novel era in the Tárikh-i Alfi has already been noticed. Another very serious accusation has been laid against this work, of leaving out several important events during the period it embraces; and the omission of the decisive battle of Cadesiah in A.D. 636, which preceded the final subjugation of Persia, has been especially commented on as a proof of carelessness. much greater objection to be made to the Tárikh-i Alfi is the plan of the work: it is constructed in the form of Annals, like the tedious Historical Library of Diodorus; and thus we are compelled to turn over page after page of this voluminous history, before we can trace the connexion of events in any particular country which may happen to be the subject of our investigation. Nothing but an excellent Index could remedy such a defect. There is confusion also sometimes about the dates. And protracted affairs are grouped under one year, the exact dates of their various phases not being sufficiently stated.

The compilers appear to have availed themselves of all the best sources of information open to them; for there is no historical work, Arabic or Persian, of any celebrity amongst modern European scholars, which they do not quote; often applying a very judicious criticism in selecting the most trustworthy records, and rejecting the fabulous legends with which so many of them abound. The authorities quoted on Indian affairs are few, but more may be mentioned in the Preface, which was written by Abú-l Fazl, according to his own acknowledgment.

The work is not often quoted, but it was greatly used by Haidar Rúzi.

I have seen no notice of the existence of this work in European libraries.¹ Parts of it are to be met with in India, but not one library, which I know of, contains a perfect copy. It is a work of great size. The portion I have seen was a folio of 1646 pages, with 40 lines to a page, and it was very incomplete. At Haidarábád there is a copy in two volumes, which, though imperfect, contains, in the first volume, 1336 pages of 19 lines each, and, in the second, 2066 pages of 31 lines each. One of the best mannscripts is in the possession of the Nawáb of Murshidábád, which is thus described:

The second volume consists of 976 pages of 20 lines, and contains the events from the year 127 to 500, after the death of Muhammad.

The third volume consists of 640 pages of 20 lines, and contains the events from the year 501 to 672.

The fourth volume consists of 1092 pages of 21 lines, and contains the events from the year 673 to 974.

Two more volumes therefore are required to make this work complete. I was anxious to make further inquiries about the Nawáb's copy, but the librarian seemed indisposed to furnish any more information respecting it, and gave evasive answers; evincing thereby a suspicion, which, if anywhere, is certainly excusable in the neighbourhood of Calcutta, where commercial profligacy has brought the European character into very low repute.²

^{1 [}There are several volumes of the work in the Library of the Ren India Calif.

It will be observed at p. 164 that the arthur, Malla Ahmad was irrelated of his house by a man who personaled on of the rapid movement. The facility called in the original by the Turkish was Color, which was not in emphasically, rarely used in India. Claim of Coloract, signific a Line of the coloract.

[The Extracts which follow afford ample means of judging of the character of the work. The earliest of them, preceding the reign of Akbar, appeared with some others in Sir H. Elliot's original publication, and they record events which have been passed over without notice by the historians quoted in the earlier volumes of the present work. The passages relating to the reign of Akbar have been selected and translated by the Editor as interesting in themselves, and as affording the means for comparing the Tárikh-i Alfi with the Tabakāt-i Akbari. The two works are generally very much in accord, but their language and style are different. Still the resemblance of the two works is such as to induce a belief that one author had access to the work of Sergeant, an Officer of the Court. His proceedings upon this occasion confirm the bad reputation of a class, from which, only a few years afterwards, we were enabled to coin our expressive word chouse. In A.D. 1609, a Cháus from the Grand Signior committed a gross fraud upon the Turkish and Persian merchants resident in England, by cheating them out of 4000%. (Gifford's Ben Jonson, iv. 27). Hence, from the notoriety of the circumstance, came the expression to chouse, just as in the present century we have got to burke, and some other very significant terms.

The authors of the period eaught gladly at the expression, and familiarized it to after ages by making frequent use of it. Richardson gives the following instances:—

Gul or Mogul,

Tag rag, or other hogen-mogen, varden, Ship-jacks, or chouses.

Ford, Lady's Trial, ii. 2.

Dap. What do you think of me, that I am a Chiaus?

Face. What's that?

Dap. The Turk was here. As one would say, do you think I am a Turk?

Face. Come, noble doctor, pray thee, let's prevail; this is the gentleman, and he is no Chiaus.

Ben Jonson, Alchemist, i. 1.

He stole your cloak and pick'd your pocket, Chous'd and caldes'd ye like a blockhead.

Butler, Hudibras, ii. 3.

It is obvious to remark, that if, in the age of our forefathers, cheating to the extent of only 4000l. was sufficient to consign a whole class to an immortality of infamy, how many more expressive words, dissyllables as well as monosyllables, might not the transactions of 1847-48 encourage us to add to our vocabulary, since even 40,000l. is not sufficient to satiate the voracity of a Calcutta Chaus.—See Chnrchill (chap. viii. p. 248), where Captain Robert Coverte (1609) says, "The governor put him in a house with a chouse or keeper." EXTRACTS.

Anno 68 after the death of Muhammad (Hijra 78 = 697 A.D.).1

When 'Abdu-lla, the son of Abúbakr, arrived at Nímroz, Hajjáj sent a message, requesting him not to linger in Sijistán, but to march without delay towards Kábul, as signs of rebellion and disaffection had exhibited themselves in the chief, Ráíbal.2 He had formerly entered into a treaty with the Muhammadans, and agreed to pay a tribute annually into the treasury, and as long as he found the Muhammadans powerful, he paid the tribute, but whenever they were engaged in other affairs, or exhibited weakness, he withheld it. 'Abdu-lla, in obedience to the commands of Hajjáj, turned towards Kábul with the armies of Kúfa and Basra, and as fast as the Muhammadans advanced, Ráíbal retreated towards Hindústán. Dádah Sharaíh, one of the officers of 'Abdu-lla, pursued Ráibal seventeen parasangs. At this time, the ruler of Kábul sent persons to some of the nobles and well-wishers of the State, desiring them to secure those roads, by which the Muhammadans had entered the country, in such a manner that they should neither obtain any supplies, nor have the opportunity of retracing their steps. The consequence was, that after a few days such a famine broke out in the Muhammadan camp, that every one despaired of ¹ [Muhammad died on the 12th Rabi'a-l awwal, in the eleventh year of the Hijra, A.D. 632, or according to some writers ten days earlier. life. Upon this, 'Abdu-lla said to Sharash Hans, "It is advisablo for us to treat with the infidels, and to offer them 70,0001 dirhams to remove from our way, so that we may betake ourselves to a place of security." Sharail replied, "Whatever amount you offer to the infidels, the divan will place to your individual account." 'Abdu-lla rojoined, "Such a demand even would be preferable to the alternativo of starvation in these dreadful places." Sharaih said, "My ago oxceeds a hundred years, and I never expected to arrive at this period of existence. It has long been my prayor before the throne of God that I might suffer martyrdom, and the time for its accomplishment has now arrived." Saying this, he mounted his horse, and exclaimed, "O Musulmáns, ye who have a desiro to be martyrs, follow me!" Upon which, a few men came forward, and joined him, and with boldness rushing to the battle-field, they charged the infidels, and kept on fighting till thoy were slain.

'Abdu-lla, after paying 70,000 dirhams to the enemy, returned with his followers. When they arrived at the Muhammadan frontier, food was served out to them; and so famished were they, that those who satisfied their appetite died immediately. When this was known, they appeared their hunger more moderately, and were thus by degrees restored to their former strength.

Anno 426 after the death of Muhammad 3 (436 H.=1044 A.D.).

One of the events of this year was, that three of the principal Rájás of Hind, having formed a confederacy, with an intent to deliver Lahore from the Muhammadans who had risen up in rebellion against Maudúd, son of Mas'úd, laid siege to the eity. Upon seeing this, the commander of the Muhammadan forces in Lahore again made submission to Maudúd, and collected together the entire Muhammadan force. When the Rájás learnt that the Muhammadans had again submitted to Maudúd, son of Mas'úd, two of them, in dread of him, withdrew to their country, but the third, whose name was Deopal Harnama, delayed his retreat alittle, in order to try his strength with the Muhammadans. latter, when satisfied of their superiority, made a sally, compelled the Rájá to fly before them, and killed many infidels in the pursuit. The Rájá retired within a stronghold, which the Muhammadans invested and pressed vigorously. The fort was a small one, and the troops which accompanied the Rájá to that place amounted to 5000 horsemen and 70,000 foot soldiers. The infidels found themselves on the verge of destruction, and sent deputies to the Muhammadans begging for quarter; but the Muhammadans would not consent, unless the infidels surrendered every one of their fortresses. At length, when the infidels had no other alternative than to yield, they accepted the conditions, and saved their lives. The property and treasure of all their forts fell into the hands of the Muhammadans, together with 5000 Muhammadans who were imprisoned in them. These, having been set free, joined the victorious army.

When the Muhammadan army had settled affairs with Rájá Deopál Harnáma, who was superior to all the kings of Hind in power and grandeur, they directed their attention to another Rájá, named Máb Bálrí, who, when he received the intelligence thereof, set his troops in order, and advanced with a determination to fight with the Muhammadans. Upon the meeting of the two armies, the fire of battle was kindled; and notwithstanding the inferiority of the Muhammadan forces, which did not amount to one-tenth of those opposed to them, by the help of Providence their victorious banners prevailed. The Rájá was sent to perdition, and 5000 of his army fell on the field of battle. Muhammadans took considerable booty and many prisoners. When the chiefs of Hind were informed of these circumstances, they gave in their submission, and by assenting to pay tribute, kept themselves free from the destructive swords of the Muhammadans.

Anno 471 after the death of Muhammad 1 (481 H.=1088 A.D.).

When Ibrahim, son of Mas'ud, was satisfied that there was no apprehension of any opposition from the Saljúkians, he despatehed an army towards Hindústán, and conquered several places that had not been captured by his predecessors, notwithstanding their power. One of the places which submitted to the conqueror was the fort of Júd,2 which surpassed all others in strength and extent. It was situated 120 parasangs distant from Lahore, and at the time when Ibráhím commenced operations against the fort, there was a garrison in it of 10,000 men, who fought long and valiantly against the invader. Ibráhím's efforts and resources to capture the fort very great, the garrison became dispirited; and although they had sufficient supplies and plenty of water, they nevertheless surrendered, on condition that their lives should be spared. After eapturing this fort, Ibráhím directed his attention towards another, called Damál,3 which was situated on the summit of a high hill on the borders of Hindústán; on one side of this fort there was a large river, reported to be impassable; and on the other, a large thorny jungle, into which nothing but the rays of the sun could penetrate. The jungle was, moreover, infested with venomous scrpents and flies, and abounded with elephants of enormous size. It was inhabited by a race of Hindús of gigantic form, and it was the most celebrated of all the places in Hindústán. At the foot of the hill there was no level ground suited for his operations. Ibrahim, nevertheless, with his usual courage, made an attempt to take the fort, and through the aid of God, soon captured it. He took possession of an immense quantity of property and jewels, the like of which had never been seen.

² [Firishta says it was "Ajodhan."]

Ibráhím next marched towards Derapúr, in Hindústán, a place which many great emperors had found it impracticable to conquer. Several trustworthy histories state that this place was inhabited by the descendants of the people of Khurásán, who, for their disloyal and rebellious conduct, had been long before banished the country by Afrásíab, Emperor of Túrán. place was densely populated, and was of considerable strength. There was a large reservoir of water in it, the diameter of which was half a parasang; and though both men and beasts used to drink of the water throughout the year, yet no decrease was perceptible. During the time the people alluded to dwelt in this place, the rulers of Hindústán never dared to attack it, from a conviction of its impregnable strength. When Sultán Ibráhím heard the account of this country, he resolved to conquer it, and marched against it with a large army. The inhabitants heard of his approach, and made ready to oppose him. A fierce struggle ensued, but Ibráhím at length gained the victory, and slew many of them. Those who escaped fled to the jungles. Nearly 100,000 of their women and children were taken prisoners, and an incalculable amount of booty was secured.

Anno 592 after the death of Muhammad 1 (602 H.=1205 A.D.).

It is mentioned in authentic histories that when Shahabu-d dín was defeated by the Turks of Khitá, on his return from Khwarizm, it was currently reported throughout the kingdom, that Shahabu-d dín had been missed in the field of battle, and there was no certainty whether he had perished or escaped. Consequently, enemies rose up on all sides, and every one encroached upon his territories. Among other enemies, one named Ráí Sál, who lived in the mountains between Lahore and Kabul, having united with a number of Kokars, who dwelt in those parts and paid tribute to the treasury of Shahabu-d dín, excited a rebellion, began to plunder that tract, and intercepted the communications between Lahore and Ghazni, so that no one could pass from one to the other.

Upon the return of Shahabu-d din to Ghazni in safety from his campaign, he was informed of these transactions, and consequently resolved to proceed to Hindústán, and punish the rebellions spirits of that country. For this purpose, he sent an order to Amír Muhammad, son of Abí 'Alí, whom he had appointed Governor of Lahore and Multan, desiring them to despatch the tribute of the year 601 m. as soon as possible, as it was necessary to make preparations for an expedition to Khitá. Muhammad, son of 'Alí, wrote in answer, that the tribute of the year had been collected and was ready, but that the Kokars and Ráí Sál,1 who were in possession of the hills of Júdí, had stopped the communication between Lahore and Ghazní in such a manner that nobody could travel on the road. When this account reached the cars of Shahaba-d din, he wrote to Kutbu-d din, his slave, who was the commander of the army of Hind, desiring him to send some person to the Kokars to dissuade them from persisting in such evil courses, and to inform them, that if they repented of their disobedience and came again under allegiance, he would pardon their past offences.

When Kutbu-d dín Aibak, according to the order of Shahabu-d dín sent a person to the Kokars, desiring them to submit themselves and to be obedient to the Sultán, the son of Kokar² replied, that Kutbu-d dín had nothing to do with the matter, that Sultán Shahabu-d dín should have sent a special messenger of his own, and further, that if he were really alive, he should have sent direct for the tribute, when the Kokars would have despatched it to him. The ambassador replied, "You are not of sufficient consequence for Sultán Shahabu-d dín to send any messenger to you; it is a great honour to you that he has sent even me, who am his slave's slave." The son of Kokar replied, "This is a mere story, Shahabu-d dín is no longer alive." The ambassador rejoined, "It may easily be ascertained by your sending any one of your confidential servants who can go to Ghazní, and see with his own oyes whether Shahábu-d dín be alive or not." In short, the son of Kokar being determined not to listen to the ambassador, remained firm in his rebellious disposition. When the ambassador of Kutbu-d din returned, and gave an account of what he had seen and heard, Kutbu-d din communicated the circumstances to Sultan Shahabu-d dín, who ordered him to collect the soveral armies of Hindústán, to proceed against the Kokars, and to utterly exterminate the rebel tribe. When this mandate reached Kutbu-d dín, he was engaged in preparing his forces, and was about to march against that nation. In the mean time, Shahabu-d din deferred his expedition to Khitá, and caused his army to return. Complaints of the violence and oppression of the Kokars were frequently coming in, accompanied with such accounts of their great and increasing power, that he considered it his duty to repulse these people and punish them severely, before marching his forces to any other quarter. For this reason Shahabu-d din gave up the idea of proceeding to Khitá, and encamped in the neighbourhood of Gliazní.

On the 5th of Rabi'-ul awwal of the same year, Sultan Shahabu-d din set forth from Ghazui towards Hindustan. After some days he arrived at Pershawar, and learned that the Kokars had taken up a position between Jilam and Sodra, with a large army. Having marched from Pershawar on Thursday the 25th of the said month, he attacked them unawares, and the battle lasted from morning till the time of afternoon prayer. The Kokars fought so valiantly, that the Sultan, with all his kingly power and glory, was very near being compelled to retreat; but Kutbu-d din Aibak arrived unexpectedly with the army of Hindustan, and began to make have among the Kokars. His forces were fresh and vigorous, and the Kokars, being unable to withstand them, took to flight. The Muhammadans pursuing, dealt slaughter among them in a manner which defies all description. Those who escaped the sword fled to the forest. The Muhammadans set fire to their retreat on all sides, and the infidels, resolving to perish in the flames rather than surrender to the Muhammadans, threw themselves into the fire. In this manner all who had taken refuge in the woods perished. When the mind of the Sultán was relieved from the anxiety of this outbreak, he marched towards Lahore, and gave leave to his soldiers to return to their homes, ordering them to march to Khitá after a few days' repose.

Anno 698 after the death of Muhammad 2 (708 H.=1308 A.D.)

In this year Sultán 'Aláu-d dín, King of Hindústán, proceeded to Siwána³ on a hunting expedition, when the chief of that place took to his fort and offered opposition. The fort was soon captured, and this was the first occasion that it had been taken. Sámal Deo,⁴ the chief (Mukaddam), perished, with several thousands of Hindús. In the same year, the fort of Kálwar came into the possession of 'Aláu-d dín's officers. The detail of the case is this: Káthar Deo, governor of the fort of Kálwar,1 had upon one occasion gone to the Sultan to pay his respects, when the Sultan boasted that there was no samindar at that time in Hindústán who had power to withstand his troops. Upon this, Káthar Deo, with exceeding folly, replied, that he would die rather than submit tacitly to such an assumption. The Sultan being enraged at this, dismissed him, and he returned to his own country. The Sultan then sent a female slave, named Gul Bihisht; against him. Gul Bihisht had a son called Malik Sháhín, who accompanied her on the expedition, and they besieged Káthar Deo. Just as the garrison were beginning to despair, Gul Bihisht happened to die, and Káthar Deo, sallying from the fort, attacked Malik Sháhín and killed him. Upon the death of both the son and mother, the command of the army devolved on Kamálu-d dín, who took the fort, and put Káthar Deo to death.

Gwalior.

[The campaign against Gwalior was one of the events of this year (the third of the reign). The fort of Gwalior is one of the most renowned in Hindústán, and Salím Khán Afghán (Islám Sháh) made it his residence. Up to the present time it remained in the hands of the Afgháns, and 'Adalí had placed Suhail,² one of Salím's slaves, in command of it. At this time, when His Majesty took up his residence at Agra, he gave the parganas in the neighbourhood of Gwalior as a jágár to Kiyá Khán. After a while, the Khán collected an army and invested Gwalior, but the place was so strong that he could make no impression upon it. Suhail was a man of experience, and he saw very clearly that it would be impossible to hold the fort against the growing power of his Imperial neighbour. So he sent a messenger to Rám Sháh, who belonged to the family of

^{1 [&}quot;Nahr Deo, Rájá of Jalwar," Firishta.]

² [The MS. calls him "Babhal," but the other authorities have the more likely name "Suhail."]

Rájá Mán Singh, the old ruler of Gwalior, offering to surrender to him the fort, the ancient seat of his ancestors, on receipt of a suitable payment. Suhail at the same time acknowledged that he was unable to cope with the Imperial forces. Rám Sháh, who had been watching for such a chance, took with him the money that he had, and wont to Gwalior. Kiyá Khán, the jágirdar, attacked him, and a battle was fought, in which many on both sides were killed. Rám Sháh was defeated, and escaped with difficulty, and went to the Ráná of (Udipúr)].1

Málwa.

[In this year the Emperor sent Bahádur Khán, brother of Khán-zamán, to effect the conquest of Málwa, which was in the possession of Báz Bahádur Afghán. Sultán Bahádur Gujarátí had wrested this country out of the hands of the Khiljí monarclis, and the Emperor Humáyún took this country from Gujarát. When, by the will of fate, Hindústán passed into the hands of the Afghans, Malwa also came into their possession, for the Gujarátís were unable to hold it. Shujáwal Khán,2 one of the khássa-khail of Sher Khán (Sher Sháh), was appointed governor of the province. After the death of Sher Khán, Shujáwal Khán went to visit Salím Khán (Islám Sháh), and dissensions having arisen between them, he fled to Málwa. Salím Khán marched to Málwa against him, and Shujáwal Khán, being unable to resist, fled to the mountains of Dhúngarpúr. Finally, after vows and compacts were made, he joined Salím Khán, who took him to Hindústán, and divided Málwa among other amirs. the reign of 'Adalí, Shujáwal Khán recovered Málwa, and there died. He was succeeded by his son Báz Bahádur, and when the Afghans were scattered over Hindústan by the conquering Chaghatáis, Báz Bahádur established himself as permanent ruler of Málwa. When Bahádur Khán marched against him, the affairs of Bairam Khán-khánán came to a crisis, and the campaign in Málwa was stayed.]

Conquest of Garha (Year 958 Riblat; 968 H.=1560 A.D.).1

[Khwaja 'Abdu-l Majid, who had received the title of Asaf Khán, was appointed governor of Karra, and in that province he rendered good service. One of his services was the conquest of Garha, a territory abounding in hills and jungles, which had never been conquered by any ruler of Hind since the rise of the faith of Islám.' At this time it was governed by a woman called Rani, and all the dogs of that country were very faithful and devoted to her. Asaf Khan had frequently sent emissaries into her country on various pretexts, and when he had learnt all the circumstances and peculiarities of the country, and the position and treasures of the Rání, he levied an army to conquer the country. The Rání came forth to battle with nearly 500 elephants and 20,000 horse. The armies met and both did their best. An arrow struck the Rání, who was in front of her horsemen, and when that noble woman say that she must be taken prisoner, she seized a dagger from her elephant-driver, and plunged it into her stomach, and so died. Asaf Khán gained the victory, and stopped his advance at the taluk of Chaurágarh, where the treasures of the rulers of Garha were kept. The son of the Ráni shut himself up in the fort, but it was taken the same day, and the youth was trampled to death by horses. much plunder in jewels, gold, silver, and other things was taken, that it was impossible to compute the tenth part of it. Out of all the plunder, Asaf Khan sent fifteen elephants to Court, and retained all the rest for himself.]

Capture of Chitor (Year 965 Rihlat; 975 Hijra = 1567 A.D.).

[When the Emperor marched from Gágrún against the Ráná, he had only 3000 or 4000 horsemen with him, for he hoped that the smallness of the force might induce the infidel to try the evont of a battlo. But the Ráná knew his own strength, and while the Emperor was at 100 kes distance from his country, he . fled with his family to the distant hills. Ho felt at ease about Chitor, because the Emperor's force had but little siego apparatus, and it did not seem likely that he would attempt to reduce the place. But the fort was set in order, great quantities of provisions were stored, and the garrison consisted of 8000 veterans, including the Rana's own men, with their wives and families. When the Emperor entered the Ráná's territory, and was informed of his flight, he wished to pursue him; but he ascertained that the Ráná had gone to a place far in the hills and jungles which it was impossible to reach. 'So the Emperor detormined to attack Chitor, which is an exceedingly strong fortress. When he came near the fort, the rains were so heavy, that for a time the fort was invisible; but as the weather cleared, he got a view of the place. The fortress is situated in the midst of a level plain, which has no other eminences. The circuit of this mountain at its base is six kos, and the ground upon which the walls of the fort stand is nearly three kos. Upon the top of the hill there is a fountain, but not content with that the constructors of the fort formed large reservoirs of stone and mortar, which get filled in the rainy season. So with these supplies the garrison are never short of water. The eastern side of the fort, and towards the north, is faced with hard stone, and the garrison felt quite secure as to that portion. On the other sides if guns (top), swivels (zarb-zan), catapults (sang-r'ad), and manjaniks are able to reach the fortress, they cannot do so much harm. Travellers do not speak of any fortress like this in the whole habitable world. At this time, all the space of three kos at the top of the mountain was full, and the houses of the people rose several storeys over each other. Great numbers of men guarded the battlements at the top of the walls, and great quantities of ammunition were stored in the fortress. His Majesty carefully reconnoitred the place on every side, and saw that it would not fall without a long siege. When the garrison perceived the small number of men with the Emperor, and thought of their fortress being six kos in circumference, they uttered eries of decision. The batteries were apportioned ont among the amirs, and bakkshis were appointed and sent to those amirs who had not yet come up. Every day some one arrived and went to his battery, so that in a short time the whole fort was invested.

Asaf Khán went under orders to take Rámpúr. He took the place, and having plundered and ravaged the country, he returned victorious. Husain Kuli Khán went to attack Udipúr, the capital of the Ráná and of his ancestors. He ravaged the country with fire and sword, and returned bringing great spoil and numerous prisoners from the fastnesses of the mountains. .

From day to day the brave assailants carried their attacks closer to the fort on every side, and a great number of them suffered martyrdom, for the fort was very strong, and made a most excellent defence. Orders were given for digging ditches and for constructing sábáts,1 and nearly 5000 builders, carpenters, stonemasons, smiths, and sappers were collected from all parts. Sábáts are contrivances peculiar to Hindústán; for the strong forts of that country are replete with guns, muskets, and warlike apparatus, and can only be taken by means of sábúts. A sábút is a broad (covered) way, under the shelter of which the assailants approach a fortress secure from the fire of guns and muskets. Two sabats were accordingly begun. The one which was opposite the royal quarters was so broad that two elephants and two horses could easily pass along it, and so high that an elephantrider could carry his spear. The sabats were commenced from the middle of the hill, which is a fortress upon a fortress.2 The people of the fort had never seen a sábát, and were puzzled, but they endeavoured to stop the work. Seven or eight thousand horsemen and numerous gunners exerted themselves to the utmost in attacking them. And although the sábáts had thick roofs of cow and buffalo hides to protect the workmen, no day passed without a hundred men more or less being killed. The bodies of the slain were used instead of stones and bricks. His Majesty's kindness and justice would not allow any man to be pressed for the work, but heaps of rupees and dams were scattered as hire, and each man went to work for what he could get. In a short time one sábát reached the walls, and was so high that it overlooked them. On the top of it a seat was constructed for the Emporor, from which he could see at his ease the efforts of his warriors, and from which he could also take a part in the fight if so minded. While the men of the garrison were endeavouring to interrupt the progress of the sábáts, the sappers. formed several mines under the walls, and wherever stones were met with, the stonemasons opened a way through with their iron tools. Two bastions in front of the royal battery were complotely undermined, and, according to order, both mines were filled with gunpowder. Three or four hundred brave men of the Imperial army were posted ready armed near these bastions, to rush in as soon as the explosion took place, before the defenders could rally to resist them. Both mincs were fired, and one which took offect blew the bastion from its foundations into the air, and every stone fell at a distance. A great breach was visible, and the storming party instantly rushed forward shouting their war-cry. A strong party of the garrison came forward to oppose them, and while the contest was at the hottest, and a great number of the faithful and of the infidels were struggling upon the other bastion, the mine exploded, and blew friend and foe together into the air, scattering their limbs in all directions.1 The quantity of gunpowder used was so enormous that stones of fifty and a hundred mans were hurled to the distance of two and three kos. Many corpses also were found within a radius of two kos. Saiyid Jamálu-d dín and * * * other braves of the Imperial army perished. Vast numbers of the garrison were killed. The vast quantities of dust and smoke prevented all movement in the Imperial army for a time; stones, corpses, and limbs fell from the air, and the eyes of the soldiers were injured. The enemy, concealing their loss, showed a brave front. When the Emperor perceived the state of affairs, he exerted himself more strenuously to take the place. He ordered the sábát in front of Shujá'at Khán's battery to be pushed forward. garrison was sore distressed, and ready to succumb, but no one had the courage to propose surrender to the Emperor. For he had determined that he would capture by storm this the strongest fortress of Hindústán, so that in future no other fortress should dare to resist the Imperial army. He took his position on the top of the sábát, and his brave soldiers kept up such a discharge from their bows and muskets that no one could escape from the place. His Majesty also had his own musket. deadly as the darts of fate, with which he killed every moving thing that caught his eye. On the 5th Sha'bán, 955, the assault was made by the Emperor's command. The walls had been breached in several places, and the signs of victory were in favour of the assailants. Jaimal, the commandant of the fortress, an infidel yet valiant, all day long struggled bravely in every part, inciting his men to fight and resist. At the time of evening, prayer he came in front of the royal battery, where His Majesty,/ holding his musket, discharged it as often as light blazed out in the bastion. It so often happened that Jaimal was standing in that tower when His Majesty discharged his piece into a lighted / place. The ball struck Jaimal in the forehead and killed him on the spot. When the men of the garrison saw their leader fall, they felt that all further resistance was useless; they gave up fighting, and after first burning the body of Jaimal, they performed the jauhar at their own homes. Jauhar is the name of a rite among the Hindus. When they know for certain that there is no escape, they collect their wives and children, goods and chattels, heap fire-wood around the pile, and fire it with their own hands. After the burning is accomplished, they reinto the fight, and give themselves over to death. This they esteem a great act of devotion. The great flames of the jauhar and the lull of the conflict on the bastions and walls showed the assailants that the garrison was reduced to extremity, so they began to make their way into the place in parties. Some of the boldest of the infidels, who had no wives and families, stood to their posts resolved to sell their lives. The Emperor witnessed the prowess of his warriors from the top of the súbút. Under his orders three elephants were taken through the breach into the city, and one of them, named Madkar, on that day killed / many infidels, and although he received many wounds, never turned tail. The second elephant, named Jagua, was surrounded by infidels, and died of the numerous wounds he received from spears and swords. In the last watch of the night the assailants forced their way into the fortress in several places, and fell to slaughtoring and plundering. At early dawn the Emperor wont in mounted on an elephant, attended by his nobles and chiefs on The order was given for a general massacre of the infidels as a punishment. The number of fighting men in the fortress exceeded 8000.1 Some of them repaired to the idol temple, and there fought to the last. In every street and lane and bázár there was desperate fighting. Every now and then a band of infidels, having thrown away all hope of life, would rush from the temple with swords and shields towards their own homes, and so were the more easily despatched by the warriors they encountered. By mid-day, nearly 2000 had been slain. Under the favour of heaven, Zarb 'Alí Tawáchí was the only person of note in the Imperial army who was killed, which was a very marvellous fact. Those of the fortress who escaped the sword, men and women, were made prisoners, and their property eame into the hands of the Musulmans. The place being cleared of infidels, His Majesty remained there three days, and then Near to the fort is a hill called Ram, which commands it; but in consequence of the height of the hill and the difficulty of the ascent, no one had as yet been able to get guns up on it. His Majesty now directed that some guns (top) and swivels (zarb-zan) should be placed on the hills, such places as 200 pairs of bullocks would have drawn with difficulty on heavy ground. In a few days from ten to fifteen gune, capable of discharging stones of fifty, forty, and twenty mans, wore dragged up the hill by the labour of portors. On the 3rd Shawwal, Súrjan Rái came out and waited upon the Emperor. He offered a large tribute, and gave up the keys of the fortress, which were made of gold and silver. He asked for three days' grace for his followers and people to remove their families and property out of the place, which was granted, and at the end of this time the fort with its munitions was surrendered to the royal officers. Thus this strong place was taken in one menth, and was placed under the command of Mihtar Khán.]

TABAKAT-I AKBARI

NIZAMU-D DIN AHMAD, BAKHSHI.

(1 The author of this work styled it Tabakát-i Akbar-sháht, and it is so called by 'Abdu-l Kádir Badáúní in his Muntakhabu-t Taudrikh; but the name by which it is best known in literary circles is Tabakát-i Akbari. It is also called, after the name of the author, Tarikh-i Nizámi, and the author himself observes it as a fortunate coincidence that the word Nizámi represents the date of its composition. In the Rauzatu-t Tahirin it seems to be called Tārikh-i Sultán Nizámi.

This is one of the most celebrated histories of India, and is the first that was composed upon a new model, in which India alone forms the subject-matter of the work, to the exclusion of the histories of other Asiatic countries. The work seems to have been recognized by all contemporary historians as a standard history; subsequent writers also have held it in the highest estimation, and have borrowed from it freely. Badáúní, the author of the Muntakhabu-t Tauárikh, professes his work to be simply an abridgment of this, and acknowledges himself to be chiefly indebted to it for the relation of all events down to A.H. 1002^2 (1593 A.D.). Firishta states that of all the histories he consulted, it is the only one he found complete.

The Ma-asiru-l Umara says, "This work cost the author much care and reflection in ascertaining facts and collecting materials,) and as Mír Ma'súm Bhakarí and other persons of note afforded their assistance in the compilation, it is entitled to much credit. It is the first history which contains a detailed account of all the Muhammadan princes of Hindústán. * * From this work Muhammad Kásim Firishta and others have copiously extracted, and it forms the basis of their histories, deficiencies being supplied by additions of their own; but the Tabakát occasionally seems at variance with the accounts given by the celebrated Abú-l Fazl. It is therefore left to the reader to decide which of the two authors is most entitled to credit."

² The author of the Tärikh-i Salatin-i Afüghana copied the reign of Humayan verbatim. See supra, p. 2.

European authors also hold the work in high esteem. Mr. Erskine considers Nizámu-d dín to be perhaps the best historian of the period, and Col. Lees is unable to conceive the reason why his work has not attracted more attention.

The Ma-asiru-l Umara gives the following account of our author.

Khwája Nizámu-d dín Ahmad was the son of Khwája Mukím Harawí, who was one of the dependents of His Majesty Bábar, and who, at the latter part of that king's reign, was raised to the office of diwán of the household. After the death of Bábar, when Gujarát was conquered by Humáyún, and the province of Ahmadábád was entrusted to Mirzá 'Askarí, Khwája Mukím was appointed wazír to the Mirzá. He accompanied Humáyún to Agra, when that monarch fled with precipitation after his defeat by Sher Khán Súr at Chaunsa. The Khwája subsequently served undor Akbar.

His son, Nizamu-d dín, was incomparably upright, and excelled all his contemporaries in administrative knowledge, as well as in the clearness of his intellect. It is stated in the Zakhiratu-l Khawanin, that, at the opening of his career, he was appointed diwan of the household by Akbar, but this statement has not been found in any other work.

In the twenty-ninth year of Akbar's reign, when the government of Gujarát was entrusted to Itimad Khán, Khwája

Nizamu-d din was appointed to the office of bakhshi, of that province, and when Sultan Marinin of Gujarat engaged in hostilities, 'Itimad Khan left the Kinning son, together with his own, to protect the city, he himself with the Khwaja having quitted it, with the object of himself with the Khwaja having quitted it, with the object of himself with the distance of forty miles from Kari, which is strated in the distance of forty miles from Ahmadábád; but during their absence the city fell into the hands of the insurgence and the house of the Khwaja was plundered. After this, in a lattle which was fought with those turbulent people the natural used his best exertions to quell the insurrection with his sual body of troops, in conjunction with Shahába-ê tin flate and 'Itimád Khán, but without success; and he insurant accessed to Pattan.

In the thirty-seventh year of the reign, when Asaf Khán Mirzá Ja'far Bakhshí-begí was ordered to destroy Jalála Raushání, the Khwája was appointed to the post of bakhshi. In the thirty-ninth year of the reign, corresponding with 1003 H., when the King was out on a hunting excursion, the Khwája was attacked with a severe fever at Shahám 'Alí, which reduced him very much. His sons obtained permission from the King to convey him to Lahore, but as soon as they arrived at the banks of the Ráví, the Khwája expired, and "the crocodile of death dragged him into the sea of annihilation."

'Abid Khán, one of Nizámu-d dín's sons, was favoured with frequent marks of distinction by His Majesty Jahángír, and was employed by him in various capacities. The office of bakhshi of the súba of Gujarát, which devolved on him by hereditary right, was resigned, owing to a disagreement between him and 'Abdu-lla Khán Fíroz Jang, governor of that province, by whom he was most shamefully treated. After resigning the appointment, he took only two sheets, the one wrapped round his waist, and the other round his head, as if prepared for burial, and went thus before Jahángír, accompanied by several Tákíya Mughals. This mark of his humiliation was approved of by the King, and he was pardoned. He was afterwards appointed an immediate attendant of the King, through the recommendation of the heirapparent, and was subsequently promoted to the office of diván of that prince. While holding this employment, he, with Sharif Khán Bakhshí, and several others of the body-guard, was killed at Akbar-nagar in Bengal, in a battle fought by the prince on the burial-ground where the body of the son of Ibráhím Khán Fath Jang was interred. 'Abid Khán had no son. His sonin-law, Muhammad Sharif, was for a short time governor of a strong fortress in the Dekhin, and was afterwards appointed hájib (chamberlain) of Haidarábád, in which capacity he passed the remainder of his days till his death.1

a friend as he was a bitter foe, gives a very favourable account of Nizámu-d dín. He says that in carrying into effect his projects of economy, Nizámu-d dín gave offence to Kálíj Khán, but that he received such unqualified support from the Emperor, who entertained the highest opinion of his zeal and integrity, that his opponent, together with his adherents, were soon provided for in distant posts, instead of being kept at Court, to frustrate the endeavours of Nizámu-d dín to introduce reform into the departments under his control.

"Nizámu-d dín," continues 'Abdu-l Kádir, "left a good name behind him. I was especially attached to him by the ties both of religion and friendship. When he died, tears of sorrow fell from my eyos, and I beat my breast with the stone of despair. After a short time, I bowed in resignation to the heavenly decree, but was so much afflicted by the bereavement, that I vowed I would never thereafter cultivate a new friendship with any other man. He died on the 23rd of Safar, 1003, and was buried in his own garden at Lahore., There was not a dry eye at his death, and thore was no person who did not, on the day of his funeral, call to mind his excellent qualities, and who did not hold between his teeth the back of the hand of grief. The following Chronogram records the date of his death: Mirzá Nizámu-d dín has departed; in haste, but with honour, has he gone to his final doom. His sublime soul has fled to the celestial regions, and Kádirí has found the date of his death in these words, 'A jewel without price has left this world.' "1

The author of the Tabakat-i Akbari assigns as his reasons for composing his work, that he had "from his youth, according to the advice of his father, devoted himself to the study of works of history, which are the means of strengthening the understanding of men of education, and of affording instruction by examples to men of observation." He found that in "the wide plains of Hindústán, which form an empire of vast extent," the "governing classes had assumed the title and discharged the duties of rulers" in many of its divisions, "such as Dehli, Gujarát, Málwa, Bengal, and Sindh," and "the authors of their times have written histories of their affairs, and have bequeathed them as memorials to posterity. * * * It is most extraordinary, therefore, that not a single work containing a complete compendium of the affairs of this (entire) division (of the world) has yet been written by any historian; neither have the events connected with the centre of Hindústán, the seat of government of this Empire, the capital Dehlí, been collected in one book. The work which is best known is the Tabakát-i Násiri which Minháju-s Siráj compiled, commencing with Sultán Mu'izzu-d dín Ghorí, and concluding with Násiru-d dín bin Shamsu-d din: from thence to the time of Sultan Firoz is written in the history of Zíá-i Barní; but from that time to to-day, because for the greater portion of the time there was much disturbance in India, and the people had the misfortune to be deprived of a powerful Imperial government, I have only met with a few detached and incomplete compilations. I have not heard of a single history that comprises an account of the whole of India; and now since the whole of the inlying and outlying provinces of Hindústán have been conquered by the worldsubduing sword of God's vicegerent, and all the fractions of the earth have been united in one grand whole, and many kingdoms beyond the confines of Hindústán, which none of the great sovereigns who preceded His Majesty had ever acquired, have been included in his Empire, and it is to be hoped that the seven climes will yet come under the shade of the standard of the . good fortune of that illustrious personage, and thus be protected and secure peace and prosperity, I conceived the idea of compiling, in a simple style, a history which should embrace an account of all the kingdoms of Hindústán, from the times of Subuktigin, 367 A.H. (which is the date of the introduction of Islam into Hindústán), up to 1001 A.H., or the thirty-seventh forces and slain, and Bengal was annexed to the empire of the Mughals.

Book VI.—The history of the Sharkí dynasty of Jaunpúr, from the commencement of A.H. 784 (A.D. 1382), the time of the accession of Khwája Jahúnn-sh Sharki, the first independent King of Jaunpúr, to the extinction of the monarchy in A.H. 881 (A.D. 1476), when Sultán Husain bin Mahmúd Sháh Sharkí was defeated by Sikandar bin Bahlol, King of Dohlí.

Book VII.—History of the Muhammadan Kings of Kashmir from A.H. 715 (A.D. 1315) to A.H. 992 (A.D. 1584), that is, from the time of Shamsu-d din Shah Mihr to the period when Yusuf Shah agreed to pay tribute to the Mughal Emperor.

Book VIII.—History of Sind, from A.H. 86 (A.D. 705), but more especially of the dynasties of the Jams and Arghuns, to the submission of Mirzá Jání Beg to Akbar, and the final annexation of the whole province to the Mughal empire in A.H. 1001 (A.D. 1592).

Book IX.—The history of Multán, from the Muhammadan conquest under Muhammad Kásim, but more particularly of the independent monarchy established by Shaikh Yúsuf in A.H. 847 (A.D. 1443), to the time when the province was annexed to the Mughal empire.

Conclusion.—A concise statement, comprised in a few lines, of the area of Akbar's empire, the number of cities and villages therein, and of its revenue.

The compiler of the Sahihu-l Akhbár attributes another work on Indian History under the name of Tárikh-i I'rich to the author of the Tabakát-i Akbari.

The Extracts from this work which follow are of considerable length. The reigns of Humáyún and Akbar have been translated by the Editor in full, and supply a complete translation of this the most important portion of the work.

Hazrat Khākās-i Sa'in Muhammad Humāyūn Shāh, son or Bāhan Shāh Ghāzi.¹

When the Emperor Bábar departed from this fleeting world at Agra for his everlasting abode in Paradise, Muhammad Mukim Harawi, father of the author of this history, was one of the officials of his late Majesty, and had been promoted to the position of divan of the honschold. Amír Nizámn-d dín Alí Khalifa was chief administrator of the State, and in consequence of some things which had occurred in the course of worldly business, he had a dread and suspicion of the young Prince Humayan, and was unfriendly to his succession. And if he was not content with the accession of the eldest son, neither was he favourable to the promotion of the younger. Mahdi Khwaja was son-in-law of the late Emperor, and was a generous and liberal young man. He was very friendly with Mir Khalifa, who had promised to raise him to the throne. I This fact became generally known, and several of the nobles took part with Mahdí Khwaja. Ho also fell in with the idea, and began to assume kingly airs.

It happened that one day Mir Khalifa went to see Mahdi Khwaja, who was in his pavilion. Mir Khalifa and Muhammad Mukim, the father of the author, were the only persons present with the Khwaja. When the Mir had sat for a moment, his late Majesty, in the pangs of his disease, sent for him. After he had gone, Mahdi Khwaja continued standing in the pavilion, and the anthor's father remained standing with due respect behind him. The Mahdi was considered to be a man of suspicious temperament, and being unaware of my father's presence, when Mir Khalifa had gone, he stroked his beard, and said to himself. "Please God, I will flay theo!" As soon as he had said this, ho perceived my father, and being greatly moved ho took him by the ear, and said, "O Tájik, the red tongue uses its sharp point to no purpose." My father took leave and departed. went with all haste to Mir Khalifa, and said, "Notwithstanding the existence of such intelligent princes as Muhammad Humáyún Mirzá and his brothers, you have shut your eyes against loyalty, and desiro to transfer the sovereignty to another house; the end of all this will be this." Ho then told him what Mahdí Khwaja had said./ Mir Khalifa instantly sent off to fetch Prince Humáyún, and he sent an officer to Mahdí Khwája with an order in His Majesty's name, directing him to retiro to his house. The officers hastened to the Khwaja, who was just about to sit down to dinner, and without any ceremony sent him off to his Mír Khalífa then issued a proclamation that no one was to visit or hold communication with Mahdí Khwája, and that he was not to attend the darbars

^{&#}x27; His full name was "Nasiru-d din Muhammad Humuyun," but he is commonly called "Januat Ashyani."

(On the death of the Emperor Bábar, Prince Hnmáyún, who arrived from Sambal, ascended the throne at Agra, with the support of Amír Nizámu-d dín 'Alí Khalífa, on the 9th Jumáda-lawwal, 937 H.¹ (29th January, 1530).) The date of his accession is found in the words Khairu-l mulúk. The officers expressed their devotion, and the chiefs and nobles were treated with great kindness. The mansabs and offices which were held under the late sovereign were confirmed, and the royal favour made every one happy and content., On the same day Mirzá Hindál arrived from Badakhshán, and was received with great kindness. He was gratified with the grant of two of the treasures (do khazána) of former kings, and as the gold was divided by coffers (kishti), the date was found in the words kishti-zar.³ The territories were then divided. Mirzá Hindál received the district of Mewát in jágir. The Panjáb, Kábul, and Kandahár were settled as the jágir of Mirzá Kámrán. Sambal was given to Mirzá 'Askarí. Every one of the amirs also received an increase of his jágir.

After arranging the affairs of the State, His Majesty proceeded to Kálinjar, the Rájá of which place expressed his fealty, and ranged himself among the supporters of the throne. In those days Sultán Mahmúd, son of Sultán Sikandar Lodí, with the assistance of Baban Báyazíd, and the Afghán nobles, had raised the standard of opposition, and had taken possession of Jaunpúr and its dependencies. Humáyún now marched to subdue him, and having achieved successes, he returned victorious to Ágra. There he held a great festival, and all the nobles and chiefs were honoured with robes and Arab horses. It is said that 12,000 persons received robes at that feast, and 2000 of them were presented with outer garments of gold brocade with gilt buttons.

At this time Muhammad Zamán Mirzá, son of Badí'u-z Zamán Mirzá, son of Sultán Husain Mirzá Babakrá, who had originally come from Balkh to seek a refuge with his late Majesty, now set himself up in opposition, but he was taken prisoner, and was sent as a warning for rebels to the fort of Bayána, and in the custody of Yádgár Taghai. An order was given to deprive him of sight, but the servants of Yádgár Beg saved the pupils of his eyes from the effects of the operation. After a short time he made his escape, and fled to Sultán Bahádur of Gujarát. About the same time Muhammad Sultán Mirzá, with his two sons Ulugh Mirzá and Sháh Mirzá, went off to Kanauj, and there raised a rebellion. (His Majesty sent a person with letters to Sultan Bahadur of Gujarat, demanding the surrender of Muhammad Zaman Mirza, to which he returned a haughty refusal, and then showed signs of rebellion and resistance.) This excited the anger of the Emperor, and he resolved to march against Gujarat and chastise Sultan Bahadur. He proceeded to Gwalior, and there passed two months in making excursions and hunting.

At this time Sultán Bahádur had marched with the forces of Gujarat and Malwa to besiege the fort of Chitor, and was earrying on war against Ráná Sánká. / He had sent Tátár Khán Lodí, one of his chief nobles and a very brave officer, to effect the conquest of the fort of Bayana and the dependent territory. Having reduced the fortress, he threatened Agra, whereupon the Emperor sent Prince Hindal against him. On learning the approach of the Prince, the greater part of Tátár Khán's forces deserted him and dispersed. With 300 men who remained he advanced against the Prince, and made a fierce onslaught upon the Prince's own division, in which he and every one of his followers perished. Bayana and its dependencies then reverted to the possession of the Emperor. When Sultán Bahadur heard of this, he was greatly alarmed and confounded. The Emperor being determined to chastise still further his enemy, he marched from Agra,1 and at the same period Sultan Bahadur laid siege a second time to Chitor. [Victory of Prince Kámrán at Kandahár.]

When Sultan Bahadur was informed of the march of the Emperor, he held a council of war. Many of the officers advised the raising of the siege, but Sadr Khan, who was the chief of his nobles, observed that they were warring against infidels, and that if a sovereign of Musulmans were to attack them while so engaged, he would in effect assist the infidels, and this would remain a reproach against him among Musulmans until the Day of Judgment. He therefore advised the continuance of the siege, and would not believe that the Emperor would attack them. When the Emperor had passed through Málwa, and had come to Sárangpúr, he was informed of this; so he rested there. Sultún Bahúdur carried on the siege of Chítor at his case, and finally took it by storm, and secured an immense booty. In celebration of the victory, he gave a great feast, and divided the spoil among his soldiers. Then he turned his front towards the Imperial army.

When the Emperor heard this, he marched forward, and the two armies faced each other at Mandisor,1 one of the dependencies of Múlwa. The tents were hardly pitched, when Saivid 'Ali Khán and Khurásán Khán, who commanded Sultán Bahádur's advanced guard, were defeated by the royal forces, and fell back upon their main body. The army of Gujarát was greatly dispirited, and the Sultún called a council of war. Sadr Khán advised giving battle on the morrow, as the troops were elated by the conquest of Chitor, and their eyes had not yet been seared by the sight of the Mughals. Rúmí Kháu,2 who commanded the artillery, was adverse to a pitched battle, because the guns (top) and rockets (tufang) were of little use (in the They were very strong in artillery, and except the Emperor of Rum, no other potentate could equal them. therefore counselled the entrenching 3 of the army and the earrying on of warfare daily. If the Mughals advanced, they might be met with a discharge of the guns and rockets and a large number of them would be killed. Sultán Bahádur acquiesced in this view, and ordered an entrenehment to be formed round his camp.

For two months the two armies remained confronting each other. Frequently during the day brave men desirous of fame sallied out in search of adventures; but the Mughal soldiers seldom ventured within range of the guns and rockets. Then the Emperor posted his troops around the position of the enemy, to cut off his supplies of grain and fodder and fuel. These dispositions caused a famine to ensue in the enemy's camp. Grain was not to be procured, the grass all around was consumed, and the imperfectly armed Gujarátís, through fear of the arrows, dared not venture far from the camp. The horses and animals and many men perished from want, and the army was dismounted. When Sultán Bahádur perceived that if he remained longer he would be taken prisoner, he went off by the rear of his pavilion and fled towards Mandú with five of his most trusty adherents, one of whom was governor of Burhánpúr, and the other was Kádir Sháh, governor of Málwa.¹ When his men heard of his escape, they took to flight. The date of this event is found in the words Zill Bahádur.

On the Emperor being informed of the flight of his enemy, he mounted and went off in pursuit. Having come up with Sadr Khán, who was retreating with a body of men towards Mandú, he made an attack upon him, thinking that it was Sultán Bahádur himself. He had not with him more than 3000 men, for the rest were engaged in plundering. Many of the Gujarátís were slain. His Majesty hastened on to Mandú, and Sultán Bahádur was besieged in the fort. The siege was carried on for some days, till one night a party of the royal army scaled the walls and got into the fort. Sultán Bahádur was asleep when the alarm was raised. A general panic followed, and the Gujarátís took to flight. Sultán Bahádur made off with five or six horsemen towards Gujarát, and Sadr Khán and Sultán 'Alam (Lodí) threw themselves into the fort of Súngar, which is the citadel of Maudú. Next day they came out, and were conducted to the presence of the Emperor. They were both wounded. Sadr Khán was placed in confinement,2 and an order was given for cutting off the foot of Sultan 'Alam.

² Such is the statement of one MS., not of the other. Abú-l Fazl says, on the contrary, he was received with great kindness. Sultán 'Alam had rebelled and deserted, so his foot was cut off and he was set at liberty. The fort was not surrendered without much negociation and strong assurances of personal safety.—Akbarnáma, vol. i., p. 164.

The city of Ahmadabad fell into the hands of the Mughals, and being plandered yielded enormous spoil. The Emperor again started off with all speed in pursuit of Sultan Bahadur. When the latter reached Kambay, he hastily exchanged his tired horses for fresh ones, and hurried off to the port of (Díú).2 The Emperor reached Kambay on the evening of the day in which the fugitive had quitted it.3 Noxt day, a person 4 came forward in a friendly way and gave information that the inhabitants of the neighbourhood were that night going to make a nocturnal attack upon the pursuers. The Emperor questioned him as to his motive for giving this information. He roplind, that his son was a prisoner in the hands of the victors, and he was in hopes, if the Emporor was successful, that he might obtain freedom for him. The Emperor passed the night in the greatest watchfulness, and when it was near dawn, 6000 or 6000 footmen 5 made an attack upon the royal forces, The men were on the alort, and came out of their touts and assembled outside the camp. What was left in the camp was plundered. When the morning dawned, the Mughals fell upon the Gujaratis on all sides, and put many of them to the aword 6 the Arghúns, had fled to Gujarát. He had given his daughter to Sultán Bahádur. When the latter was defeated, the Jám fell a prisoner into the hands of the Emperor. On the night of this attack, his guards, fearing he might escape, put him to death. Sadr Khán Gujarátí, who had surrendered himself at the fort of Súngar, was also put to death on this night.

Next day the Emperor marched towards Champanir, and invested the fort. Ikhtiyar Khan, the commandant of the fort, made preparations for resistance. One day the Emperor was going round the fort, when he spied a number of people who had come out of the jungle, and who, being frightened at the sight of him, fell back into the cover. He sent a party in pursuit, and captured several of them. It then appeared that, with the help of the (neighbouring) zamindars, they had conveyed grain and butter into the fort. In this place (where they had introduced the provisions) the fort was very high, perpendicular, and dangerous. But His Majesty conceived that where provisions had been passed, he also might find an entrance. He carefully examined the place, and then returned to the camp.

It then occurred to him that the strength of this part of the fort was such, that the garrison probably felt quite secure about it, and took little care to guard it. He had a number of steel spikes prepared. In the day he attacked the fort on all sides, and at night he repaired with 600 men to this place. They drove the spikes right and left firmly into (the scarp of the rock), and by means of them climbed up into the fort. The garrison, being quite at ease about this part of the fort, did not observe their entrance. When thirty-nine persons, the last of whom was Bairám Khán, had gone up, His Majesty also resolutely ascended.³ By daybreak 300 men had got in. There they found great stores of corn and butter, and other provisions, for the people of the fort. As soon as it was light, the besieging army advanced against the fort. The Emperor and his party then came down, shouting their battle-cry. On reaching the gate they opened it, and gave admission to the assailants. So this strong fortress was taken. Ikhtiyár Khán retreated into the citadel, which is called Múliyá. Great numbers of the garrison were slain, and many of their wives and children cast themselves down from the walls of the fort and were killed.

³ The Albar-nama (vol. i., p. 168) says that when thirty-nine had gone up, Humáyán wanted to proceed, but Bairán Khán persuaded him to wait fill the whole ascent was clear. Bairám Khán then went up, and Humáyán followed, being the forty-first man.

Ikhtiyár Khán then came out of the citadel and surrendered. He held a high position among the Gujarátís, and was kindly received by the Emperor, who made him one of his personal attendants.¹ The treasures of the Kings of Gujarát, which had been accumulating for many years, fell into the hands of the conquerors. The gold was divided among the soldiers, so much a head. The goods and stuffs of Rúm and Europe and China, and of every part of the world, which the Kings of Gujarát had treasured, all fell a prey to the victors. So vast was the amount of gold and effects that came into the possession of the soldiers, that no person attempted to collect revenue that year in Gujarát.

The agriculturists of the country sent a person with a message to Sultán Bahádur, to inform him that as several of the districts were not occupied by the Mughal agents, they would themselves make the proper collections, if he would send an army to protect them. Accordingly, Sultán Bahádur sent one of his slaves, 'Imádu-l Mulk,' who was distinguished for courage and justice. 'Imádu-l Mulk set about collecting forces, and by the time he reached Ahmadábád many soldiers of the army and of the samindárs had gathered round him, to the number of about 50,000 horse and foot.' He encamped within sight of Ahmad-ábád, and began to collect the revenue. When information of this was brought to the Emperor after the fall of Chámpanír, he made a second large distribution of gold out of the plunder of Gujarát among the soldiers. He then placed the fort of Chámpanír in charge of Tardí Beg, and marched towards Ahmadábád. The command of the vanguard was given to Mirzá 'Askarí, Mirzá Yádgár Násir, and Mír Hindú Beg, and they went on one day's march in advance. In the vicinity of Mahmúdábád,¹ which is twelve kos from Ahmadábád, 'Imádu-l Mulk attacked Mirzá 'Askarí, and was defeated. Many men fell on both sides.

The author of this work heard from his father, who was then wazir of Mirzá 'Askarí, that at mid-day, when it was intensely hot, the Gujarátís came hastily out of Ahmadábád. Mirzá Yádgár Násir had marched about half a kos on the right flank of Mirzá Askarí, and Mirzá Hindú Beg had encamped at the same distance on his left. The Gujarátís came on with such speed that the Mirzá had no time to array his forces, so he retired with a party of his men into a thorn brake, where he stood fast. Heedless of this disposition of the Mirzá's, the Gujarátís dispersed in search of plunder, and gathered a large booty. Mirzá Yádgár Násir and Mirzá Hindú Beg came up in due order with their forces, and the Gujarátís took to flight. Mirzá 'Askarí now came forth from the thorn brake, and pursued the Gujarátís to Ahmadábád. More than 2000 men were killed in the battle.

After this the Emperor bestowed Ahmadábád and its dependencies upon Mirzá 'Askarí in jägir,² Nahrwála Patan upon Mirzá Yádgár Násir, and Broach upon Mirzá Hindú Beg.³ Tardí Beg received Chámpanír, and Kásim Husain obtained Baroda. Khán-jahán Shírází and other nobles also received

'Askarí to have the khutba recited and coin struck in his name, and to set up his claim to independence, expecting that the troops in hopes (of reward) would devote themselves to his service. Mirzá 'Askarí did not accept this advice. After much debate and deliberation, it was determined that Mirzá 'Askarí, Mirzá Yádgár Násir, Amír Hindú Beg and some other nobles should leave Ahmadábád, and form a camp in the rear of Asáwal,1 opposite Sarganj. Sultán Bahádur also came down to Sarganj and faced his enemies. By chance a cannon ball from the camp of the Mirzá knocked down the tent of Sultán Bahádur. This greatly disturbed him, and he summoned Ghazanfar to his presence, intending to bring him to punishment. Gliazanfar asked that his punishment might be postponed until the Sultán had set his army in array, for he had heard that Mirzá 'Askarí intended to retreat during the night. When night came Mirzá 'Askari, with the approval of the amirs, retreated towards Chámpanír, leaving everything superfluous behind them.2 They halted at ten kos distance, and Sultán Bahádur pursued and came up with them. Mirzá Askarí and the amirs mounted and made a show of fighting, and then retired.

When they reached Chámpanír, Tardí Beg² exhibited hostility towards them, and shutting himself up in the fort, sent a messenger to Humáyún, to inform him that Mirzá 'Askarí had hostile intentions, and was about to march upon Agra and proclaim himself King. But before Mirzá 'Askarí retreated from Ahmadábád, the newswriters and reporters had communicated to the Emperor the proposition which Mír Hindú Beg had made to the Mirzá for his assuming the crown, and although he had not assented thereto, they reported that he entertained hostile designs. The Emperor set off with all speed from Mandú to Agra, and was met upon the road³ by Mirzá 'Askarí, who waited upon him, and told him the facts of the matter. Sultán Bahádur obtained possession of the fort of Champanir by the capitulation of Tardi Beg.

At the beginning of this year, Shah Tahmasp, in revenge of Sain Mirza, marched to Kandahar, and Kalan Beg evacuated the fort and proceeded to Lahore. It is said that Kalan Beg had built for himself a Chineso house of great elegance, and when he fled it was furnished with fino carpets and beautiful vases. This greatly pleased the Shah. Leaving Kandahar in charge of his nobles, the Shah proceeded to 'Irak. After this, Mirza Kaman marched from Lahore against Kandahar, and the Turkomans, being unable to resist him, evacuated the place and went to 'Irak. Kandahar thus once more fell into his hands.

The Emperor Humáyún remained for a year at Agra and took his pleasure. When Sultán Bahádur was defeated, he sent away Muhammad Zamán Mirzá to Hind, in order that there might be no difficulty about him, and when Mirzá Kámrán marehed against Kandahár, Zamán Mirzá laid siego to Lahore, but upon hearing of the Emperor's return, he went back again to Gujarát.

Sher Khán Afghán, who had got possession of the provinces of Bihár and Jaunpúr and the fort of Chunár, greatly increased his power and forces while the Emperor was engaged in Gujarát and Málwa. To eurb his proceedings, the Emperor marched against him on the 14th Safar, 942 H. (12th August, 1535). When he pitched his tents before the fort of Chunár, Rúmí Khán, who had quitted the service of Sultán Bahádur, and had been received into that of the Emperor, undertook the reduction of the fortress. He received full authority to do whatever he deemed necessary for the capture of the place, and every assistance was to be given to him. Rúmí Khán reconnoitered the fortress, and found that every part of the place which abutted on the land was exceedingly strong and quito impregnable. He therefore turned his attention to the river, and prepared a large vessel on which he began to build a scaffold.1. When the structure was finished, he found that the vessel would not carry it, so he had two other vessels lashed one on each side of it. Still they were insufficient to convey the scaffold. The help of another vessel was obtained, and the scaffold being now movable, it was brought close up to the fort, and the place was captured.2 When the officers of the garrison saw that the place was no longer tenable, they made their escape at night in boats. Rúmí Khán received many rewards.3 The gunners of the fort were maimed by His Majesty's orders.4 At this time, Sher Khán Afghán was earrying on war against the ruler of Bengál,5 who fled wounded before him, and sought refugo with the Emperor Humáyún. The Emperor then marched against Bengál. Sher Khán then sent his sons 6 Jalál Khán and Khawás Khán to secure Garhí, which was situated on the road to Bengál. This Garhí is a strong place.7 On one side of it there is a high mountain and a large jungle quite insurmountable, and the river Ganges runs near to the other side. The place stands between Bihar and Bengál. The Emperor sent Jahángír Beg Mughal against Garhí.

Hindál Mirzá accompanied the Emperor to Mungír, and afterwards he was sent towards A'gra against Muhammad Sultán Mirzá, Ulugh Mirzá, and Sháh Mirzá, who had fled from His Majesty, and were creating disturbances in the country. Muhammad Zamán Mirzá, when he found that he met with no success in Gujarát, sent ambassadors to the Emperor at A'gra, suing for pardon.¹

Bahlol, one of the great Shaikhs of the time, and learned in theology, to whom the Emperor was much attached. He was executed upon the pretence of his being in league with the Afgháns, but in reality it was brought about by the leaders of the revolt in order to widen the breach between Mirzá Hindál and the Emperor. The khutba was now read in the name of Hindál. When the Emperor heard of this defection, he left Jahángír Beg in charge of Bengál, with a reinforcement of 5000 chosen men, and set off for Agra.

At this time Muhammad Zamán Mirzá, son of Badí'u-z Zamán Mirzá, returned from Gujarát with great contrition, and waited upon the Emperor, who forgave him, and did not utter a word of repreach. Long marches and the unwholesome climate of Bengál destroyed the horses of the soldiers, and the Emperor's army arrived quite destitute of provisions at Chaunsá. The antirs who had been left in Jaunpúr and Chunár came to wait upon the Emperor. Sher Kháu, having got intelligence of the distress of the army, came and placed himself in front of the Emperor, and the armies remained confronting each other three months.

When Mirzá Kámrán returned to Lahore from Kandahár, and heard of the rebellion of Mirzá Hindál, of the difficulties of the Emperor, and of the growing strength of Sher Khán, he formed the design of seeuring Ágra. Mirzá Hindál proceeded to Dehlí, and there Fakhr 'Alí and Mirzá Yádgár Násir² shut themselves up in the fortress, and in spite of all his efforts, Hindál was unable to take the eity. So when Mirzá Kámrán came near to Dehlí, Mirzá Hindál felt himself constrained to join him.³

Abú-l Fazl calls him "Shaikh Phúl," and says he had been sent by Humayún express from Bengúl to use his influence in inducing Hindúl to desist from his rebellious designs.—Akbar-náma, vol. i., p. 188.

On hearing of Hindal's proceedings, Mirza Yadgar Nasir had left Kalpi and hastened by way of Gwalior to Dehli, and prepared the city for a siege.—Akbarndma, vol. i., p. 189.

Fakhr 'Alí came out on the top of the fortress, and seeing Mirzá Kámrán, he told him that Mirzá Yádgár Násir would not surrender Dehlí, so the best thing he could do would be to go on to Agra, and if he obtained possession of that city, Dehlí would be given up to him. Mirzá Kámrán consequently marched on towards Agra, and when he approached that city, Mirzá Hindál separated from him, and went away in the direction of Alwar.

The news of Mirzá Hindál's rebellion, and of the arrival of Mirzá Kámrán at Dehlí, was brought to the Emperor at Chaunsá, and greatly increased his distress. Sher Khán now sent to the Emperor a darwesh named Shaikh Jalil, whom he called his murshid, to propose terms of peace. He offered to givo up all the territory except Bengál, to swear upon the Holy Book that he would live in peace, and that the coin should be struck and the khutba read in the name of the Emperor. These proposals were received with the greatest satisfaction. But next morning Sher Khán fell upon the royal army unawares, and put it to the rout before it could be drawn up in array.1 Prior to the attack, the Afghans had taken possession of the bridge and had broken it. They also came out on the river in boats, and despatched with their spears every man of the royal army whom they found endeavouring to escape by water. Muhammad Zamán Mirzá was drowned. His Majesty rode his horse into the water, and nearly perished; but he was helped over the river by a water-carrier, and went off towards Agra.

Mirzá Kámrán had ere this arrived at Agra. Mirzá Hindál was at Alwar in security. After the Emperor had crossed the river, he hastened on, accompanied by only a few horsemen, of whom the author's father was one, and arrived at Agra. Mirzí

² Mirzá 'Askarī also was with him.—Aleer-neme, vol. i. p. 184. "

Kámrán had received no intelligence before the Emperor arrived. The latter repaired at once to the pavilion of his brother, and on seeing each other, the eyes of the brothers filled with tears. Hindál Mirzá received forgiveness for his offences, and then came and waited upon the Emperor. Muhammad Sultán Mirzá and his sons, who had for a long time been engaged in rebellion, also came in and joined them. Consultations were held. Mirzá Kámrán was desirous of returning to Lahore, and showed unbounded expectations. The Emperor assented to all his extraordinary propositions. Khwája Kalán Beg exerted himself to bring about the return of Mirzá Kámrán. The negociations went on for six months. Meanwhile Mirzá Kámrán had been attacked with severe sickness, and some designing persons had instilled into his mind the belief that his illness was the result of poison administered to him by the Emperor's directions. So, ill as he was, he started for Lahore, having sent on Khwaja Kalán Beg in advance. He had promised to leave a considerable portion of his army to assist his brother at Agra; but in spite of this promise he carried all off with him, excepting only 2000 men whom he left at Agra under the command of Sikandar. Mirzá Haidar Doghlat Kashmírí,1 who had accompanied Kámrán, remained with His Majesty, and was received into favour. Kámrán also took away with him many of the soldiers of Agra.

Sher Khán, emboldened by the dissensions between the brothers, advanced along the banks of the Ganges, and sent a detachment over the river against Kálpí and Etáwah. Kásim Husain Sultán U'zbek, along with Yádgár Násir Mirzá and Sikandar Sultán, fought against the Afgháns in the neighbourhood of Kálpí. They killed a son of Sher Khán who was in command, and a great many men of his army, and they sent his head as an offering to Agra. The Emperor then marched against Sher Khán to the banks of the Ganges, and passed over the river at Kanauj. For one month he remained encamped in sight of the enemy. His army numbered 100,000 horsemen, while that of the Afghans did not exceed 50,000. At this conjuncture, Muhammad Sultán Mirzá and his sons again exhibited their perfidy, and without reason fled from the royal army. detachment which Mirzá Kámráu had left as a reinforcement also went off to Lahore. So disaffection having become the fashion, many of the troops went off and seattered over various parts of Hindústán. The rainy season came on, and the place where the army was encamped being flooded with water, it was determined to move to higher ground. While this was being done Sher Khán came forth to fight. The battle was fought on the 10th Muharram of this year [947 H., 17th May, 1540 A.D.]. Many of the soldiers, being dispirited, fled without fighting. A few only of the bravest went into the fight, and the day being lost, the whole army fled. Humáyún became separated from his horse in the Ganges, and was helped out of the water by Shamsu-d din Muhammad Ghaznivi, who afterwards, in the reign of Akbar, received the title of Kháu-i a'zam. When Sher Khán heard of his escape, he was sorry, and exclaimed, "I was in hopes he had perished, but he has got off." 1 The Emperor fled to Agra; and when the enemy approached that city, he made no delay, but went to Lahore. At the beginning of Rabí'u-l awwal all the Chaghatáí Sultáns and amirs were assembled in Lahore; but Mirzá Muhammad Sultán and his sons, who had come to Lahore, fled from thence to Multán. Mirzá Hindál and Mirzá Yádgár Násir found it expedient to go towards Bakar and Tatta,3 and Mirzá Kámrán determined to go to Kábul as soon as the party was broken up.

It was abundantly manifest to the Emperor that there was no possibility of bringing his brothers and his amirs to any common agreement, and he was very despondent. Mirzá Haidar Beg, after much consultation, had been sent off with a party who had volunteered for service in Kashmír, and Khwája Kalán Beg was ordered to follow him. When the Mirzá had reached Naushahr, and Kalán Beg had got as far as Síálkot, intelligence reached the Emperor that Sher Khán had crossed the river [Biyáh] at Sultánpúr, and was only a few kos distant. His Majesty then passed over the river of Lahore. Mirzá Kámrán,1 after proving faithless to the oaths and compacts which he had made to help in whatever was decided upon, now thought it expedient to retire with the Emperor to Bahra. When Khwaja Kalán Beg heard (of this retreat), he marched rapidly from Síálkot, and joined the camp of Humáyún. When Mirzá Haidar reached Kashmír, he found the people fighting against each other. A party of them came and waited upon him, and through them Kashmír fell into his hands, without striking a stroke. On the 22nd Rajab he became sovereign of Kashmír, in the city of Nau-shahr, as is related in the Tabakát-i Kashmir.

At Bahra, Mirzá Kámrán and Mirzá 'Askarí parted from Humáyún, and went off, accompanied by Khwája Kalán Beg, to Kábul. Mirzá Hindál and Mirzá Yádgár Násir still remained with him, but after a few stages they disagreed. For twenty days they absented themselves, but falling into difficulties, on the advice of Mír Abú-l Baká, they once more came back and made their submission. On the banks of the river Sind a famine arose in the camp, and boats to cross the river were not procurable. Bakhshúí Langáh then brought iu several boats laden with corn, and was very favourably received. The army then crossed the river, and went onwards to Bakhar, but made a halt at the town of Luhari (Lohri). Mirzá 'Askarí then crossed the Sind, and went to the town of Pátar, because the wants of an army were easily supplied there. From Luhri, which is near Bakhar,2 to Pátar, the distance is fifty kos. Mír Táhir Sadr was sent as ambassador to Sháh Husain Arghún, ruler of Tatta; and Samandar Beg, one of the courtiers of the Emperor, was sent with him in charge of a horse and a robe. The gist of the message which they conveyed was, that the Emperor had been compelled to come to Tatta, and his object was to attempt the recovery of Gnjarát. The Shúh was invited to come and wait upon the Emperor, and consult with him about the conquest of Gnjarát. Sháh Husain Arghún temporized for six months by sending complimentary messages, and said that there could be no good in staying near Bakhar, but if the camp were nearor Tatta it would be more convenient, for five or six months might be lost while they were negociating. If the Emperor would come nearer, whatever seemed advisable should be done.1 Grain becoming scarce in Bakhar, the Emperor marched off to Pátar, where Mirzá Hindál was staying, for he had heard that Mirzá Ilindal intended to go to Kandahar. It was on one occasion in this year, while the Emperor was staying in the camp of Mirzá Hindál, that he married Maryam-i Makani Hamída Bánú Begam, the mother of the Emperor Akbar, and spent several days of happiness and pleasure in the camp of Hindal. The Emperor now forbad him to go to Kandahar, and directed him to return to Luhari.

Karácha Khán, who was governor of Kandahár, wrote letters to Mirzá Hindál, inviting him to Kandahár, and the Mirzá started off and went thither. When Humáyún was informed of it, he was much troubled by the want of union among his brothers. Mirzá Yádgár Násir had pitched his camp about two miles below the royal camp, and the river ran between the two camps. Ho also now expressed his intention of going to Kandahár. On the Emperor being informed of this, he sent Mír Abú-l Baká to reassure the Mirzá, and to for. 'iis going to Kandahár.' As he was crossing the rivor on his return, a party

An agreement was made with the Mirza that he was to have one-third of Hindusta: when it was recovered, as also Ghazni, Charkh, and Lohgar, which Bahar 'm' to the Mirza's mother.—Akbar-ndma, vol. i., p. 212.

came out of the fort of Bakhar, and assailed his boat with a shower of arrows. One of them pierced the Mír, and he died. The Emperor showed great sorrow for his loss. The date of his death, 948 H., is found in the words Surur-i káinát.

After this Mirzá Yádgár Násir crossed the river, and paid a visit to the royal camp. After much consultation it was resolved that the Mirzá should be left at Bakhar, and that His Majesty should march on to effect the conquest of Tatta. But the Mirzá did not show any signs of concord and friendliness. When the Emperor marched for Tatta, a large body of soldiers parted from him and stayed at Bakhar. Mirzá Yádgár Násir remained at Bakhar, and increased his forces, because during that year no heavenly or terrestrial evil had befallen the agriculture of Bakhar. His Majesty now proceeded by means of boats to the fort of Sihwán. A party of soldiers on board of the boats, as they came near to the fort, landed and attacked a body of men who had come out of the fort, and drove them in again.

The victors returned, and represented that the reduction of the fortress was an easy matter, so His Majesty crossed over the river, and invested the place. But before his arrival, a party of Sháh Husain's officers had entered it, and had done their best to increase its strength. When Sháh Husain heard that it had been invested, he proceeded by boats to the vicinity of the Emperor's camp, and employed himself in cutting off the supply of grain. Great scarcity followed, and many men lived (entirely) upon the flesh of animals. The siege went on for nearly seven months, and the place was not captured, so a messenger was sent to Mirzá Yádgár Násir at Bakhar, to tell him that the fall of the fort depended upon his approach; for if the besiegers marched to attack Sháh Husain, the garrison would be free to gather in provisions, and so protract the defence.

Want of salt and scarcity of grain would prevent the royal forces remaining under the fort much longer; but if Mirzá Yádgár would attack Sháh Husain, the latter would be unable to maintain his position. Mirzá Yádgár sent a portion of his force, but no advantage was gained through this reinforcement. Again a messenger was sent to call Mirzá Yádgár, and 'Abdu-l Ghafár, who was Mir-i mál of the Emperor, received the commission. 'Abdu-l Ghafár went to Mirzá Yádgár, and spoke about the perilous condition of the royal army, but the Mirzá and his officers deemed it advisable to remain where they were, and effect the conquest of Bakhar.

Sháh Husain had sent representatives to Mirzá Yúdgár Núsir, and had drawn near to his camp. He promised that he would acknowledge the supremacy of the Mirzá, give him his daughter in marriage, and read the khutba in his name.1 Delighted with these offers, the Mirzá was hoodwinked by Sháh Husnin, and so placed himself in hostility to the Emperor. Having thus secured himself against Mirzá Yádgár, and being aware of the distress and weakness of the army of Humáyán, Sháh Ilusain advanced closer to the royal camp, and captured the vossels (which were conveying provisions) for the army. Unable to continue the siege of Silwan, the Emperor was compolled to retreat towards Bakhar.2 When he approached near to Mirzú Yádgár Násir, he sent to him for boats in which to cross the river, and the Mirzá, who was in league with the people of Tatta, sent to them, desiring them to come at night and carry off the boats. Next morning he artfully reported that the enemy had carried off the boats. The Emperor remained inactive some days for want of boats. At length, two camindúrs of Bakhar waited upon him, and (under their guidance) s boats which had been sunk were raised. Humáyún then er the river. When Mirzá Yádgár Násir learnt of the passage over, being greatly alarmed and ashamed, he, without waiting upon the Emperor, marched off hastily against Sháh Husain; and the latter being quite unprepared, the Mirzá fell upon a large force from Tatta which had disembarked, and killed and made many prisoners, and then returned. After this action, Sháh Husain returned to Tatta, and Mirzá Yádgár Násir, repentant and ashamed, waited upon the Emperor and presented the heads of his enemies. Once more Humáyún forgavo him, and spoke not a word of all that had passed.

Shah Husain now wrote letters to Mirza Yadgar Nasir, and again drew him over to his side. The Shah requested him to secure for him the two zamindars who had obtained the boats for the Emperor. These men, being informed of the demand, repaired to the camp of Humayan. Mirza Yadgar sent a messenger to Humayan, representing that he had some revenue matters relating to his jagir of Bakhar to settle with these two zamindars, and requested that they might be sent to him. The Emperor ordered that several persons should accompany the men, and bring them back again when the business was concluded. The instant Mirza Yadgar Nasir saw them, he took them forcibly from the Emperor's men, and sent them to Shah Husain. Thus he once more exhibited his animosity to the Emperor, and never again sought a reconciliation.

The men of Humáyún's army, being in great distress, began to desert by ones and twos to Mirzá Yádgár Násir. Mun'im Khán' also, and his brother, had thoughts of running away. This intention was communicated to Humáyún, and he ordered them into confinement. Mirzá Yádgár Násir, in the depths of his infamy, now prepared to turn his arms against Humáyún, and the latter, being informed of his movements, made ready for fighting. Máshim Beg, a person high in Mirzá Yádgár's confidence, when he heard of his proceedings, restrained him, and nolens volcus made him return. It now became evident to Humáyán, that if he tarried longer his men would all desert to Mirzá Yádgár Násir, and that the worst might be expected from the Mirzá's baseness. In this extremity, he resolved upon marching to Mál Deo, one of the faithful zamindárs of Hindústán, who at that time surpassed all the zamindárs of Hindústán in power and in the number of his forces. This Mál Deo had sent letters to Bakhar, declaring his loyalty, and offering assistance in effecting the subjugation of Hindústán.

Humáyún accordingly marched towards Mál Deo's country by way of Jesalmír. The ruler of Jesalmír shamefully took an numanly course. He sent a force to attack the small party of the Emperor on the march, but it was defeated and driven back with loss. Humáyún had a great many men wounded. He marched with all possible speed till he reached the country of Mál Deo. Then he sent on [Shamsu-d dín Muhammad] Atká Khán to Mál Deo at Joudhpur, while he himself halted for a few days.

[Proceedings of Mirzis Hindál, Kámrán, and 'Askari at Kandahar, Ghazni, and Kábul.]

Humáyún remained on the borders of Mál Deo's territories awaiting the return of Atká Khán. When Mál Deo was informed of the Emperor's weakness, he was much alarmed, for he knew that he had not sufficient forces of his own to withstand Sher Khán. For Sher Khán had sent an ambassador to Mál Deo, holding ont great expectations; and the latter, in the extreme of perfidy, had promised to make Humáyún a prisoner if possible, and to give him over into the hands of his enemy. Nágor, and its dependencies, had fallen into the power of Sher Khán, and consequently he was afraid lest Sher Khán should be annoyed and send a large army to his territory against Humáyún. To keep the Emperor in ignorance, Mál Deo detained the envoy Atká Khán, and did not give him permission to return. But Atká Khán contrived to ascertain what was passing through the mind of Mál Deo, and went off without any formal dismissal.

Removing from thence on the 18th Rabi'u-l awwal, he proceeded by Diwarawal and Wasilpur to a place twelve kas from Bikanir, at which place he arrived on the 17th Rabi'u-l akhir. Thence he proceeded to Pahludi, thirty kas from Joudhpur, and afterwards made three more forward marches to the tank of Juki.—Akhar-nama, vol. i., p. 219.

One of the Emperor's librarians, who at the time of his defeat had fled to Mál Deo, now wrote to the Emperor, informing him that Mál Deo was bent upon treachery, and advising him to get out of his territory as quickly as possible. Atká Khán also spoke in the strongest terms upon the matter. So Humáyún marched off at once to Amarkot. Two Hindús, who had come to act as spies upon him, fell into his hands, and were brought to his presence. They were questioned, and an order was given that one of them should suffer the punishment of death, with the object of arriving at the exact facts of the matter. The two prisoners broke loose, and snatching a knife and a dagger from two bystanders, they despatched seventeen living creatures, men, women, and horses, before they were overpowered and slain. The Emperor's own horse was among the animals killed. As he had no other horse to ride, his equerries sought to obtain some horses and camels from Tardí Beg, but he disgraced himself by giving a refusal. Then the Emperor mounted a camel. Nadím Koka was walking on foot, while his mother was riding his horse; but when he saw the Emperor seated on the camel, he made his mother dismount, presented the horse to the Emperor, and made her ride on the camel which he had used.

The road lay through a loose sand, and water was not procurable. The army toiled on with great difficulty, and every moment the news came of the approach of Mál Deo. The Emperor ordered Mun'im Khán, with a detachment, to march cautiously and slowly in the rear, and if the enemy approached, to give him battle. When night came on, that detachment lost the way, and at daybreak the enemy's forces were in sight. Shaikh 'Ali Beg, Darwesh Koka, and some others were (in the rear), numbering in all twenty-two persons. Darwesh Beg, son of Báki Jaláir, was one of the party. They proceeded against the enemy, who was emerging from a narrow defile. Shaikh 'Ali killed the commander of the enemy with his first arrow, and every arrow that his little band discharged wounded some prominent man of the enemy's army. Unable to endure this, the enemy turned, and his great army fled before such an insignificant troop. Many were killed in their flight, and many camels fell into the hands of the victors. When the intelligence of the victory reached the Emperor, he hastened to publicly express his thanks.

The army encamped by a well which contained a little water, and the party which had lost its way during the night now came in, which was another cause of rejoicing. Next day the march was resumed, and for three days no water was found. On the fourth they reached a well: a drain was beaten when the bucket reached . the surface of the earth, to give the bullock-driver notice to stop; 1 for the well was so deep that a call would not reach him. In the intensity of their thirst, some men could not restrain ! themselves. Four or five threw themselves upon the bucket, the rope broke, and the bucket fell back into the well. Overcome with suffering, they attered eries and lamentations, and some east themselves intentionally into the well. In this way many perished through thirst. Next day the march was resumed, and at the hottest time they reached a river (ab). The horses and camels had not tasted water for several days, and now they drank so much that many of them died.

At length, with extreme toil, they reached Amarkot, which is 100 kos distant from Tatta. The ránd, that is to say the ruler (hákim) of Amarkot,² was kindly disposed, and came out to meet the Emperor, and offered his services. The army rested from their hardships some days in the city, and whatsoever the Emperor had in his treasury ho distributed among his soldiers. He had arrived here with no great force, so he lovied a sum of money from Tardí Beg and others as a benevolence, and graciously presented the rand and his sons with gold and girdles and daggers. Sháh Husain Arghún had slain the father of the rana, and so the rana now collected a considerable number of men from his territories, and went with the Emperor in the direction of Bakhar. The Emperor's family, with their paraphernalia, undor his orders remained at Amarkot. Khwája Mu'azzam, brother of Maryam Makání, was left in charge of them.

Fortune new for a time changed its treatment of the Emperor, by giving him a son, and impressing an imperishable mark upon the page of time.1 The child was born on the 5th Rajab, 949 (15th October, 1542). Tardí Beg Khán conveyed this intelligence to the Emperor in the neighbourhood of Amarkot, and the Emperor under spiritual guidanco, as will be narrated in tho proper place, gavo to the child the name of Jalálu-d dín Muhammad Akban.2

He then continued his march towards Bakhar, but he wrote very urgent letters as to the safety of the young prince. Upon reaching the pargana of Jún, he halted there for a while. He sent for his family and the suite of the prince, and then his eyes were gladdened by the sight of his son. The force which had been collected from the parts around dispersed while he remained at Jún; and his bravo and intrepid officer, Shaikh 'Alí, fell in an action with the troops of Shah Husain Arghun, in one of tho parganas of Tatta. His soldiers began to desert one by one from his eamp. Mun'im Khán even went off. His Majesty, seeing that it was not advisable to remain longer in this country, determined upon going to Kandahar. At this time he was joined by Bairám Khán, who had come from Gujarát. He now sent representatives to Sháh Husain Arghún, asking for boats to enable him to cross the river, and the Sháh, delighted with his determination, sent him thirty boats and 300 camels. His Majesty then crossed the river, and began his march to Kandahár.

Sháh Husain sent a person to Mirzá 'Askarí and Mirzá Kámrán, to inform them of the Emperor's intention to march to Kandahár, and they wrote back desiring him to bar his progress and make him prisoner. The perfidious Mirzá 'Askarí, when His Majesty reached Shál and Mastán,² marched rapidly from Kandahár, and sent forward Hawalí 3 Uzbek to watch his movements. This man had received kindness from the Emperor. He obtained a powerful horse from Mirzá 'Askarí, and betook himself to the Emperor's eamp. When he arrived, he dismounted from his horse, and went to the tent of Bairám Khán, whom he informed of Mirzá 'Askarí's advance, and of his designs against the Emperor. Bairam Khán immediately proceeded to the Emperor, and standing at the back of the tent he told him of Mirzá 'Askarí's approach. "What is the worth of Kandahár and Kábul," said the Emperor, "that I should strive with my faithless brothers?" Then he mounted his horse, and sent Khwája-i Mn'azzam and Bairám Khán to bring up the Empress. They made all speed to do so, and conveyed her and the infant prince to the Emperor. There were very few horses in the Emperor's train, so Tardí Beg was asked for one. Again he gave a churlish refusal, and would not himself accompany his master.

The Emperor determined to go to Trák, and started off thithor, taking with him the Empress, and having only a few persons as escort. The young prince was only one year old, and the weather was very hot, so he was left behind. Mirzá 'Askarí soon afterwards reached the camp, when he was informed that the Emperor had gone safely off, leaving a party in charge of his camp. Next day he, in his extreme insolence, entered the Emperor's audience hall, and Atká Khán delivered up to him the young prince. Under the orders of the Mirzá, Tardí Beg was made prisoner, and officers were sent to search the tents and seizo all the effects of the Emperor. Then he carried the prince off to Kandahár, and gave him into the charge of Sultán Begam, his own wife, who treated him with great tenderness.

The Emperor was accompanied by twenty-two persons, among whom were Bairám Khán, Khwája Mu'azzam, Bábá Dost Bakhshi, Khwája Gházi, Haidar Muhammad Akhtar-begi, Mirzá Kuli Beg, Shaikh Yúsuf, Ibráhím Aishak-Akási, and Hasan 'Alí Beg Aishak-ákásí. They set off without even determining their route. When they had gone a little way, they fell in with three or four Bilúchis, who directed them, and they arrived with great toil at the fort of Bábá Hájí. The Turks who were in the place gave them such provisions as they had. Kliwája Jalálu-d dín, son of Malimúd, who had been sent by Mirzá 'Askarí to eollect the revenues of this district, waited upon the Emperor, and presented him with horses, camels, mules, and such things as he possessed. Next day Hájí Muhammad Kokí, who had escaped from Mirzá 'Askarí, waited upon the Emperor. The hostile proceedings of his brothers made these parts no safe place for His Majesty, so he proceeded onwards towards Khurásán and Irák. Upon entering Sístán, Ahmad Sultán Shamlú, governor of the province under Sháh Talımásp, received him with the greatest kindness. He remained some days in Sistán, and Ahmad Sultán showed him every kind of hospitality and attention, sending even his own women to wait upon the Empress as handmaids. Ahmad also presented to him all kinds of provisions and necessaries, and enrolled himself among the number of his slaves. All these His Majesty courteously accepted, and then presented them to him.

Upon holding a consultation, Ahmad Snltán advised His Majesty to proceed to Irák by way of Tabas Kílakí, because that way was the nearest, and he offered to accompany him on the road. His Majesty replied that he had heard great praise of the city of Hirát, and that it would be more pleasant for him to proceed by that route. So His Majesty started for Trák. attended by Ahmad Sultán. At that time Sultán Muhammad Mirzá, eldest son of Sháh Tahmásp, was governor of Hirát, and Muhammad Khán Sharfu-d dín Ughli Taklú held the post of Atalik or tutor to the young prince. When they heard of the near approach of the Emperor, they sent 'Ali Salian who was one of the nobles of Taklu, to meet him and confirst him in with due honour. He joined His Majesty on the boriers of the territory of Hirát, and brought him with all peremony to the eity. The prince, with his officers and attendants, then priceeded to wait upon him and pay their respects, omining nothing that could do him honour. Mahammad Khan was admitted to the privilege of an introduction.

His Majesty, with his retinue, halted at Hirát. Muhammad Khán treated him with the greatest hospitality, and His Majesty was highly pleased with his reception. He received all that he eould require, and lacked nothing until the time of his meeting with Shah Tahmasp. All the palaees and gardens of Hirat are beautiful to see, and His Majesty visited them, after which he took his departure for Meshhed and Tús. Sháh 'Alí Sultán Istajlu, governor of Meshhed, also did all in his power to show honour and hospitality to His Majesty, and under the orders of Shah Tahmasp, every governor on the route supplied him with all things he required. Under the orders of the Shah, a large number of nobles and great men went forth to meet him, and the arrangement was made that, from Dámaghán to the Sháh's camp, one of these nobles was to have charge of the duties of hospitality in each march. Provisions were sent from the royal camp, and His Majesty was feasted at every stage until he reached Kazwin. The Shah's camp had been moved to Pulák-Súrlík, and Bairám Khán was sent thither by His Majesty to wait on the Shah. He returned, bringing a letter eongratulating His Majesty on his arrival. His Majesty eontinued his journey, and at every place he came to he received marks of attention from the people. At length he reached Pulák-Súrlík, and had an interview with Sháh Tahmásp, who entertained him and showed him every honour and distinction, worthy both of host and guest.

In the eourse of conversation, the Shah asked the Emperor what was the reason of his defeat, and he replied that it was the rivalry and faithlessness of his brothers. Bahram Mirza, the Shah's brother, was offended at this, and treacherously advised the Shah to have the Emperor killed in the course of the night. But the Shah's sister Sultanan, who was very liighly esteemed by her brother, and exercised great influence in all affairs of State, did all in her power to protect and help the Emperor. Kází Jahán Kazwíní, who was the Sháh's diwán, and Hakím Núru-d dín Muhammad, who was his physician, and was high in his favour and confidence, were not content to be at all wanting in goodwill towards the Emperor. The hakim both openly and privately lost no opportunity of forwarding the Emperor's interests. One day the Sháh, in order to gratify the Emperor, went out with a party of nobles and grandees to hunt with bows and arrows. Bahrám Mirzá, who had an old quarrel with Abú-l Kásim Khulafá, under pretence of shooting at some animal, struck him in front with an arrow, and he died upon the spot.

Sháh Tahmásp, having assented to the Emperor's wish to depart, provided all necessaries for his journey, and he appointed his son Sháh Murád, then an infant at the breast, with a force of 10,000 men to protect him. Humáyún expressed his intention of going to Tabriz and Ardabíl, and the Sháh wrote farmáns to the governors of those places, directing them to show him every honour and attention. After travelling to those places, the Emperor turned towards Kandahár, and went to pay a visit to Meshhed the holy. He had brought the Kazilbásh (Persian) prince with him, and Bidágh Khán, the prince's tutor, was commander of his army. When they reached the fort of Garmsír, they took possession of the Garmsír territories. On arriving at Kandahár, a large body of men sallied out of the fort and made what resistance they could, but were defeated. The Kazilbash army then encamped within view of Kandahár. Five days afterwards the Emperor arrived, and it was then invested. siege went on for three months, and there were daily engagements, in which many men on both sides were killed.

Bairám Khán now went to Kábul on an embassy to Kámrán Mirzá. He was encountered on his way by a party of Hazáras, and a fight ensued, but he overpowered them and went on to Kábul. There he had an audience of Mirzá Kámrán, and he also had interviews with Mirzh Hindhl, Mirzh Sulaiman son of Khan Mirzh, and Mirzh Yhdghr Nasir who had arrived from Bakhar in a distressed condition. Mirzh Khanan sent Mahd 'Ali Khan-zhda-i begam to Kandahar with Bairam Khan to settle terms of peace if possible. When they arrived at Kandahar, and waited on the Emperor, Mirzh 'Askari was still intent upon fighting (and holding out).

The Persian forces were disheartened by the long duration of the siege, and had thoughts of returning. They had conecived that when Humáyún approached Kandahár, the Chaghatái tribes would rally round him. But when a long time passed, and no one came to his succour, and the fact of Mirzh Kamran's advance to the assistance of Mirzh 'Askari became generally known, the Persians were greatly alarmed. By a happy turn of affairs Mirzá Kámrán fell back, and Mirzá Husain Khán and Fazáil Beg, brother of Mun'im Khán, deserted him and joined the Emperor. The Turkomans were inspirited, and after a few days Muhammad Sultan Mirza, Ulugh Beg Mirzá, Kásim Húsain Sultán, and Sher-afgan Beg came over. This greatly encouraged the Persians. Muyid Beg, who was a prisoner in the fort, managed to escape by stratagem, and let himself down from the walls by a rope. His Majesty received him with great kindness. A party also under the command of Abú-l Hasan, nephow of Karrácha Khún, and Munawwar Beg, son of Mír Beg, escaped from the fortress. Mirzá 'Askarí now lost heart, and proposed to surrender. The Emperor in his great kindness granted him terms. He then called together, the Persian commanders, and induced them to engage that for three days no one should molest the numerous Chaghathi families that were in the place. In consequence of this engagement, the garrison of the place came forth next day, with their wives and families. Mirzá 'Askarí also came out, and with shame waited on the Emperor, who uttered not a word of reproach. The Chaghatáí chiefs, with their swords upon their necks and shrouds in their hands, were allowed to present themselves to the Emperor, and were pardoned.

It had been agreed with the Persians that as soon as Kandahár was taken it should be given up to them, and now the Emperor gave them possession of it, although he possessed no other territory. Bidágh Khán (and) Mirzá Murád, son of Sháh Tahmásp, were conducted into the fort, and the place was surrendered to them Most of the Persian chiefs returned to 'Irák, and no one remained with Mirzá Murád except Bidágh Khán, Abú-l Fath Sultán Afshár, and Sútí Wali Sultán Kadámú.

When winter came on, the Chaghatái people had no place of shelter, so the Emperor sent a person into Kandahár to Bidagh Khan, to represent the need which they had of some protection against the rigours of the winter. But he, in his inhumanity, did not make that reply which the emergency required. So the Chaghatáis were in great trouble. 'Abdu-lla Khán and Jamil Beg, who had come out of Kandahár, now fled to Kábul. Mirzá 'Askarí also, having found an opportunity, made his escape; but a party being sent in pursuit, he was caught and brought back. His Majesty then placed him in confinement. The chiefs of the Cnaghatái tribes (ulius) now met in council, and resolved that under the necessities of the case, the fort of Kandahar must be taken from the Persians. and should be given up to them again after the conquest of Kábul and Badakhshán. By a strange coincidence, it happened that Mirzá Murád, son of Sháh Tahmásp, died on that very day. So the enterprise was resolved upon, and a strong party was appointed to carry it out. Hájí Muhammad Khán, (son of) Bábá Kashka, went first of all to the gate of the fortress with two of his servants. The Turkománs, who suspected that the Emperor wanted to get possession of the place, had for some days past prevented the Chaghatáis from entering the town. It happened that some camels laden with forage were going into the city, and seizing this opportunity, Háji Muhammad proceeded to the gate of the city. The guards assembled round the gate, and refused to let him enter. With great daring he hím now marched against Kámrán from Kisham and Kunduz, and he, not having sufficient forces to oppose them, retreated to Rosták. A body of Uzbeks fell upon him on the march and carried off a large part of his baggage. In this distressed state Kámrán wished to proceed by way of Zohák and Bámíán into the Hazára. When Humáyún was informed of this, he sent a force to Zohák and. Bámían to protect the country. Karrácha Khán, Kásim Husain Sultán, and some other traitorous nobles, despatched a messenger to Kámrán, advising him to take the road to Zohák, and promising to join him in the day of battle. When Mirzá Kámrán came in sight, Karrácha Khán and his associates cast the dirt of ignominy on their heads, and deserted Humáyún. Being joined by these men, Kámrán offered battle. Although Humáyún's force was small, it met the attack bravely, and a desperate fight followed. Pir Muhammad Akhtá and Ahmad, son of Mirzá Kulí, were killed in this fight. His Majesty exerted himself greatly. He received a sword-cut on the top of his head, and his horse was wounded; but he kept his assailants off with his spear, and made his way out of the fight.1 He then proceeded towards Zuhák and Bámíán, and was joined by a party of fugitives, who had taken the same route.

Mirzá Kámrán now, once more, obtained possession of Kábul. Humáyún went with Hájí Muhammad and a party of adherents towards Badakhshán. Sháh Bidágh, Tolak Kúchín, and Majnún Kákshál, and a party of ten were sent out to reconnoitre in the direction of Kábul, but of the whole party, one only, Tolak Kúchín, returned to the Emperor. Astounded at the treachery of his followers, he went and encamped at Andaráb. Here he was joined by Sulaimán Mirzá, Ibráhím Mirzá, and Mirzá Hindál, with their forces. After forty days Humáyún marched towards Kábul. In the mountains he was met by Mirzá Kámrán, Karrácha Khán, and the forces of Kábul.² The armies drew up against each other. Here Khwája 'Abdu-s Samad Masúr deserted Kámrán and joined Humáyún, who received him graciously. Kámrán was defeated, and fled to the mountains of Mandrúd. The traitor, Karrácha Khán, was taken prisoner, and was being conducted to Humáyún, when Kambar 'Alí Bahárí, whose brother had been put to death at Kandahár by order of the Khán, seized the opportunity and killed him. Mírzá 'Askarí fell into the hands of the Emperor's men in this battle.

The Emperor now returned to Kábul, and remained there for a year in peace. Again a body of soldiers, craving for action, went off and joined Kámrán, and he collected round him a body of nearly 15,000 horse. Hájí Muhammad Khán went off without leave to Ghaznín; so Humáyún was compelled to march towards Lamghán and interrupt Kámrán's proceedings. Then, in concert with the Afghans of Muhmand, the khail of Daudzái, and the chiefs of Lamghán, Kámrán went off towards Sind. Humáyún remained for a while in Lamghán hunting, and then returned to Kábul. Kámrán, supported by the Afgháns, again advanced, and once more Humáyún marched out against him. Humáyún sent to Bairám Khán, governor of Kandahár, directing him by some way or other to go to Ghaznín and secure Hájí Muhammed Khán. The Hájí had sent to Mirzá Kámrán, advising him to come to Ghazni, and take possession of the country, for he was ready to show his obedience. Hereupon Kámrán marched from Pesháwar by way of Bangash and Gurdez towards Ghaznín, but before he could reach there Bairám Khán had entered the city, and Hájí Muhammad was compelled to go to him. Khán and the Hájí went together to Kábul, and Kámrán, hearing of this on his march, retreated to Peshawar.

Humáyún now returned from Lamghán to Kábul, but a few days before his arrival Hájí Muhammad had made his escape and had gone off again to Ghaznín. Bairám Khán was again sent with some other nobles after him, and when he brought him back the Hájí received forgiveness. Mirzá 'Askarí, under the orders of Khwája Jalálu-d dín Mahmúd, had been carried to Badakhshán and placed under the charge of Mirzá Sulaimán, who was to convey him to Balkh; 1 and Sulaimán accordingly sent him thither. In the course of this journey 'Askarí's days came to an end in the country of Rúm.

The Afgháns kept Mirzá Kámrán among them, and busied themselves in raising forces, so Humáyún was compelled to go out against them. In the course of this campaign Hájí Muhammad Khán was executed with his brother, in punishment of his many offences. Supported by the Afgháns, Mirzá Kámrán made a night attack on Humáyún's camp, and Mirzá Hindál was killed in the engagement. The date of his death is found in the words "Shahádat ash ba talab shud." Kámrán's attack failed, and he retreated. The family and attendants of Hindál were sent to Ghaznín with the young prince Akbar, and the territory of Ghaznín and its dependencies was assigned to them as an iktá'.

When Humáyún continued his advance against the Afgháns, they were unable to protect Kámrán any longer, so being without resource he fled to Hindústán, and took refuge with [Sultán] Salím Sháh Afghán. All his people and followers were harried, and Humáyún then returned to Kábul. After the army had taken a few days' rest, it marched by way of Bangash and Gurdez against Hindústán. All the disaffected in these parts received chastisement. Humáyún crossed the Indús between Dinkot and Níláb (5 Safar, 962 A.H., 29 Decr., 1554 A.D.).

Mirzá Kámrán, disgusted with the ungenerous treatment he received from Salím Sháh hakim of Hindústán, had taken flight and escaped into the hills of Síálkot. From thence, by great energy, he had conveyed himself to Sultán Adam Ghakar. Thereupon Sultán Adam secured him, and wrote to inform Humáyún. This overture was graciously received by Humáyún, who sent Mun'im Khán to demand the captive. Sultán Adam surrendered Kámrán, who was brought into Humáyún's presence at Parhála. The Emperor, in his natural humanity, was ready to overlook the offences of Kámrán, but the officers and the chiefs of the Chaghatáí clans, who had suffered many things through Kamran's hostility, having agreed together, went to Humáyún, and stated that the security of the Chaghatáí clans and people depended on the destruction of Mirzá Kámrán, for they had repeatedly experienced the effects of his hostility. Humáyún had no escape but by consenting that Kámrán should be blinded. 'Alí Dost Barbegí, Saiyid Muhammad Bikna and Ghulám 'Alí Shash-angusht (the six-fingered) deprived Mirzá Kámrán of sight with a lancet.1 The date of this event has been anticipated a little. Afterwards Mirzá Kámrán obtained permission to make the pilgrimage, and being furnished with all that he could require for the journey, he set out. He arrived at Mecca, and there died.2

Humáyún, having reached the foot of the fort of Rohtás, determined upon the conquest of Kashmir. It was represented te him that a samindár named Bírána had a place in the hills so strong that none of the Sultáns had been able to subdue it, and that he might protect the road and prevent the passage into Kashmír, so that the conquest would be difficult. But Humáyún's judgment did not acquiesce in these objections, and he marched onwards. At this time the news arrived of the march of [Sultán] Salím Khán Afghán from Hindústán to the Panjáb, and it caused great discontent in the army. When the time for departure arrived, those officers and amirs who were adverse to the Kashmir expedition went off all at once to Kábul. Upon the Emperor discovering that no one favoured the campaign in Kashmír, he returned towards Kábul. Crossing the Indus, he gave directions for rebuilding the fort of Bikrám (Pesháwar), and as his men laboured heartily in the work it was soon accomplished. Sikandar Khán Uzbek was appointed governor of the fort. Upon Humá-yún's reaching Kábul, Prince Akbar set out for Ghaznín, and Khwája Jalálu-d dín Mahmúd and a party of nobles proceeded thither in attendance upon him.

After a time the intelligence came from India of the death of [Sultán] Salim Khán, and of dissensions among the Afgháns. Some designing persons had informed His Majesty that Bairám Khán entertained hostile intentions, so Humáyún proceeded in force to Kandahár [which had been long held by Bairám Khán]. The latter came forth to meet Humáyún with due ceremony, and showed every mark of fealty and obedience. When Humáyún returned he appointed Mun'im Khán to Kandahár. But Mun'im Khán remonstrated, and said that an expedition to Hindústán was resolved upon, and if the chief men were offended and alienated, disaffection would arise in the army. After the conquest of Hindústán that course might be pursued which the necessities of the time might require. So the government of Kandahár was confirmed to Bairám Khán, and that of Zamín-dáwar 1 to Bahádur Khán, brother of 'Alí Kulí Khán Sistáni. The great camp then returned to Kábul, and the army was employed in preparing for the invasion of India.

One day when Humáyún was riding about and hunting, he observed that as his mind was dwelling upon the invasion of India, he would ask the names of the first three persons he met, and would take them as auguries of the result. The first person they encountered, upon being asked, said, that his name was Daulat Khwája. A little further on they met another villager, who said his name was Murád Khwája. On this His Majesty observed how excellent it would be if the third person's name should prove to be Sa'ádat Khwája. At a short distance they met the third man, and his name really turned out to be Sa'ádat Khwája. All the king's companions were greatly surprised and impressed with this result, and became sanguine of victory in Hindústán.³

³ This same story is told by Khondamir, who died twenty years before this time. See supra, p. 118.

In Zi-l hijja; 961, (November, 1553), the Emperor began When the army encamped at Peshawar, Bairam his march. Khán, according to orders, came up from Kandahár, and the royal standards passed over the river Indus. Bairám Khán, Khizr Khwája Khán, Tardí Beg Khán, Iskandar Sultán, and some other nobles, went on in advance. Tátár Khán Kásí, the governor of Rohtás, although the fort had been strengthened, made no resistance, and fled. But A'dam Ghakar, although he owed service, did not join the army. Humáyún continued his march towards Láhore, and when the Afghans of that city became aware of the near advance of his army, they took to flight. He entered Lahore 1 without opposition, and then sent on the nobles in command of the advance to Jálandar and Sirhind. The districts of the Panjáb, Sirhind, and Hissár all came without a struggle into the hands of the Chaghatáí forces.

A body of Afgháns having assembled at Dípálpur, under the leadership of Shahbáz Khán and Nasír Khán fghán, the Emperor sent Mír Abú-l Ma'alí and 'Alí Kulí Sístíní' to disperse them. The Afgháns were defcated, and their baggage and their wives and families became the prey of the victors.

Sikandar Afghán, who held possession of Dehlí, sent 30,000 mcn under Tátár Khán and Haibat Khán to attack the advanced forces in Sirhind. The Chaghatáí forces concentrated at Jálandar, and for all the numbers of the enemy and their own paucity they were ready to fight. They advanced and crossed the Sutlej. Towards the close of day the Afgháns became aware of their transit, and marched forth to give battle. Notwithstanding the strength of the enemy, the Chaghatáí chiefs determined to fight, and as the sun went down a great battle began. The Afgháns began the battle with their archers, but as it was getting dark the arrows took-little effect on the Mughals, but the Afgháns being greatly annoyed by the fire (átashí) threw themselves into a neighbouring village. As most of the houses in the villages of Hindustán are thatched, a fire broke out, and lighting up the field of battle tho [Mughal] archers came out and plied their weapons heartily by the light of the burning village. The enemy, in the glare of the fire, presented a fine mark for their shafts, and being unable to endure longer took to flight. A great victory was gained, and elephants and much spoil fell into the hands of the victors. When the news of the victory reached Lahore, the Emperor was greatly delighted, and showed great honour to his generals. All the Panjáb, Sirhind, and Hissár Fírozah were now in his possession, and some of the dependencies of Dehlí also were in the hands of the Mughals.

On hearing of this defeat, [Sultán] Sikandar Afghán marched forth to take his revenge, with 80,000 horsemen and elephants and artillery. He marched to Sirhind, and there he entrenehed and fortified his camp. The Chaghatái generals strengthened the fortifications of Sirhind, and making a good show of resistance, they wrote letters to Humáyún for reinforcements. Ho thereupon sent Prince Akbar towards Sirhind, and as he approached the generals came forth to meet him. The forces were drawn out in array with the greatest show against the enemy, who was four times more numerous than the Mughals. For some days the daries of its in both armies challenged each other to combat and of Frince Akb upon a mup for battle. A second division, under Bairám a little furz Khánán, on the one side; and on the other a third division with Iskandar Khan, 'Abdu-lla Khan Uzbek, Sháh Abú-l Ma'álí, 'Alí Kulí Khán, and Bahádur Khán. Then they attacked the enemy. In the engagement all the nobles exhibited dauntless courage and the most determined resolution. The Afghans, 100,000 in number, were defeated, being inferior in courage, and [Sultán] Sikandar fled. The victors pursued the enemy and put many of them to death; and having secured an enormous booty, returned triumphant to wait upon the Emperor and congratulate him. Under his orders a despatch of the victory was drawn, in which the honour of the victory was ascribed to Prince Akbar, and this was circulated in all directions.1

Sikandar Khán Uzbek was then sent on to Dehlí, and the royal camp was moved to Sámána. A body of Afgháns in Dehlí made their escape in hot haste, and Sikandar Uzbek entered and occupied the city. Mír Abú-l Ma'álí was sent to Láhore to keep in cheek [Sultán] Sikandar, who had fled into the Siwálik mountains. In the month of Ramazán the Emperor entered Dehlí, and onco more the khutba was read and the coins were stamped with his name in the territories of Hindústán. The chiefs who had taken part in the campaign were most liberally rewarded, and each one was made the ruler of a province. The remainder of this year was spent in ease and enjoyment.

Abú-l Ma'álí, who had been sent to oppose [Sultán] Sikandar, treated the nobles who had been appointed to support him very unceremoniously, interfering with their territories and appropriating their treasure. So Sikandar daily grew stronger. This came to the knowledge of the Emperor, who immediately sent Bairám Khán in attendance upon Prince Akbar as his atálik or governor, to put an end to Sikandar's operations. Sháh Abú-l Ma'álí was ordered to proceed to Hissár Fírozah.

At this time a person named Kambar Díwána had collected round him a body of supporters in the Doáb and Sambal, and had taken and plundered Bayána. Unquiet and adventurous men gathered about him from all quarters. 'Alí Kulí Khán Sístání was sent against him, upon which he shut himself up in the fortress of Badáún. In the course of a few days 'Alí Kulí Khán took the fort, captured Kambar Díwána, put him to death, and sent his head to the Emperor.

But now the most extraordinary event occurred. On the 8th Rabi'u-l awwal,² at sunset, the Emperor ascended to the roof of the library, and there stood for a short time. As he was descending, the muazzin cried aloud the summons to prayer, and he reverently sat down on the second step. When he was getting up again his foot slipped, and he fell from the stairs to the ground. The people in attendance were greatly shocked, and the Emperor was taken up senseless and carried into the palace. After a short time he rallied and spake. The Court physicians exerted all their powers, but in vain. Next day he grow worse, and his case was boyond medical help. Shaikh Júlí was sent to the Panjáb to summon Prince Akbar. On the 15th Rabí'u-l awwal, 963 n. (24th January, 1556), at the setting of the sun, he left this world for Paradise. The date of his death is given in the line, "Humáyán bádsháh az bám uftád."

He reigned for more than twenty-five years, and he was fiftyone years old. His angelic character was adorned with every manly virtue, and in courage and heroism he excelled all the princes of the time. All the wealth of Hindústán would not have sufficed to maintain his generosity. In the seiences of astrology and mathematics he was unrivalled. He made good verses, and all the learned and great and good of the time were admitted to his society and passed the night in his company. Great decorum was observed in his receptions, and all learned discussions were conducted in the most orderly manner. The light of favour shone upon men of ability and worth during his reign. Such was his elemency that he repeatedly pardoned the crimes of Mirzá Kámrán and the Chaghatái nobles, when they were taken prisoners and were in his power. He was particular about his ablutions (wasu), and never allowed the name of God to pass from his tongue until he had performed them. One day he called Mir 'Abdu-l Hai, the sadar or chief judge, by the name of 'Abdal. But when he had gone through his ablutions he apologized, and said that as Hai was a name of the Almighty he was unable to use that name before performing purification. Every apparent and conceivable virtue was manifest in him. May God have mercy on him!

Shaikh Júli, who was sent off to the Panjáb during His Majesty's illness, obtained an interview with Prince Akbar at Kalánor. He communicated the fact of the King's illness, and intelligence of his death soon after arrived. After due observance of the rites of mourning, the nobles who were in the suite of the Prince, under the leading of Bairám Khán, acknowledged the succession of the Prince, and so, on the 2nd Rabi'uss sání, he ascended the throne of empire at Kalánor.

Sultan Muhammad 'Adall.

But Sikandar guessed his object, drew a dagger and inflicted such a wound upon the shoulder of Sarmast Khán that he fell dead at his feet. He then killed and wounded several others. In the midst of this scene 'Adalí got up and ran into the women's apartments. Sikandar rushed after him, but 'Adalí bolted the door on the inside, and with difficulty escaped. The nobles of 'Adalí who were present drew their swords to prevent the escape of Sikandar, who, raging like a maniae, cut down and killed and wounded wherever he went. This state of affairs went on for an hour or two (yak do gari), till Ibráliím Khán Súr, the husband of 'Adalí's sister, drew his sword and wounded Sikandar. Others then fell upon him and despatched him. Daulat Khán Lohání killed Sháh Muhammad Farmulí also with one blow of his sword.

On the very day of this tragedy it happened that as Muhammad Farmulí was going to wait upon 'Adalí he met Táj Khán Kirání, brother of Sulaimán and 'Imád Kirání, as he was coming out of the fort of Gwalior, after having taken leave of the King. They both inquired as to each other's affairs, and Táj Khán said, "I am going to retire from this field of strife" (m'arika): "come with me, for here all things are changed." Muhammad Farmulí did not acquiesce, but went to pay his visit to 'Adalí, when what we have seen happened.

When Táj Khán fled from Gwalior, he formed designs against Bengal. 'Adalí first sent a force after him, and then marched against him in person. The hostile forces met near Chhatrá-mau, forty hos from Agra and thirty from Kanauj, and Táj Khán was defeated. He fled to Chunár, and on his way he took possession of several local treasuries belonging to 'Adalí, and enriched himself with their contents. He also seized a troop (halka) of elephants, one hundred in number, and went and joined his brothers 'Imád, Sulaimán, and Khwája I'lyás, who held several districts on the banks of the Ganges and at Khawaspur Tanda. Open war began, and 'Adali led his army from Gwalior to the banks of the Ganges, and there fronted his adversary. One day Himun told 'Adali that if he would give him a troop (halka) of elephants, he would cross the river and take the conrage out of the Kirani rebel. 'Adali complied with this request, and Himun defeated the rebels.

Ibráhim Khán, son of Ghází Khán Súr, had married the sister of 'Adali, and was one of the consins of Sher Khán (Sher Shah). His wife found out that 'Adali intended to put him in confinement, so he fled from Chunár, and went to his father Ghází Khán, who held the government of Bayána and Hindún. 'Adalí sent I'sa Khán Níúzí in pursuit of him, and a fight took place near Kálpí, in which 'I'sa Khán was defeated. Ibráhím then proceeded to Dehli, and caused the khutba to be read in his name. Afterwards he took possession of Agra and of several districts. . 'Adalí, upon hearing of these conquests, marched against Ibráhím. On reaching the Jumna, Ibráhím Khán sent a person to 'Adali, promising that if 'Adalí would send to him Rái Husain Jalwání, Baliadur Klinn Sarwani, called A'zam Humayun, and some other great nobles, upon whose assurances of protection he could depend, he would come in and make his submission. nobles were accordingly sent. But Ibrúhím won them all over to his side, and then declared against 'Adalí, who, having no hope of support, returned to Chunár. Ibráhím Khán now took the title of Ibráhím Sháh, and assumed the insignia of royalty.

About this time also Almad Khán, another nephew of Sher Khán (Sher Sháh), who was married to a second sister of 'Adalí's, and was one of the territorial amirs of the Panjáb, received the support of Tátár Khán Kánsí, Haibat Khán, and Nasíb Khán, who were among the principal nchles of Salím Khán's (Sháh's) time. Thus supported he assumed the title of "Sultán Sikandar," and led his forces against Ibráhím. The riva armies met at the village of Farra, ten kos from Ágra Sikandar's army did not exceed 10,000 horse, but Ibráhím had 70,000 horse and 200 persons to whom he had given velvet tents, banners, and kettle-drums. Sikandar offered peace, upon condition of receiving the government of the Panjáb. But Ibráhím was proud of the great strength and preponderance of his army, so he rejected the peaceful overtures of Sikandar, and arrayed his army for battle. In the end Sikandar was victorious, and Ibráhím was compelled to fly to Sambal. Sikandar then became master of Agra and Dehlí.

Intelligence now arrived that the Emperor Humáyún had marched from Kábul to Hindústán, and had taken Lahore; so Sikandar gathered his forces and went towards that city. Ibráhím also collected a new army at Sambal, and went in the direction of Kálpí. 'Adalí now sent Hímún, the bakkál, who was his wasir, with a large army, and with 500 war-elephants and artillery, against Agra and Dehlí. When Hímún reached Kálpí, he resolved to dispose of Ibráhím first, and hastened to meet him. A great battle followed, in which Hímún was victorious, and Ibráhím fled to his father at Bayána. Hímún followed and invested Bayána, which he besieged for three months.

Sikandar Khán, ruler of Bengal, now raised the standard of rebellion, and marched with the forces of that country against Jaunpúr, Kálpí, and Ágra. 'Adalí therefore summoned Hímún, who accordingly raised the siege of Bayána. When he reached the village of Maudákar, six kos from Ágra, Ibráhím came up and attacked his rear, but he was defeated and again fled to his father. From thence he went to the country of Bhath, and fought with the Rájá, Rám Chand, who made him prisoner. But the Rájá showed him great honour, seated him upon the throne, and waited upon him as a servant. Here Ibráhím remained until a party of the tribe of Míánas,¹ who dwelt near Ráísín, being at enmity with Báz Bahádur, the ruler of Málwa, invited Ibráhím to be their ruler. They drew out their forces against Báz Bahádur, and Ibráhím joined them. Durgávatí the Rání of Garha marched from her own country to support him. But Báz Bahádur hearing of this, sent some persons to the Rání, and induced her to relinquish this design and return home. Upon this defection Ibráhím thought it inexpedient to tarry longer where he was, so he went to the country of Orissa, one of the dependencies of the kingdom of Bengal. Here he remained until the year 975 (1567-8), when Sulaimán Kirání took possession of Orissa. Upon the faith of solemn promises he then came to see Sulaimán, who treacherously caused him to he slain.

The victorious Ilimin continued his march and joined 'Adali. They fought with Muhammad Khán Gauria at the village of Chappar-ghatta, fifteen kos from Agra, and Muhammad was killed. Thus victorious 'Adalí went to Chunar, and sent Himun to Agra and Dehlí to oppose the progress of Humáyún. Sikandar Khán Uzbek,1 Kivá Khán Gang,2 and the other nobles who were in Agra, abaudoned the city, and retreated before him towards Dehli. 'I'sa Khan marched against Dehli, but being encountered and descated by Tardí Beg Khán at Pánípat, he was put to death by the Imperial officers. 'Adali was still at Chunár, when Khizr Khán, son of Muhammad Khán Gauria, caused the khutba to be read and coins to be struck under the title which he had assumed of Sultan Bahadur. To avenge his father, he made war upon 'Adalí, and put him to death. terminated the Afghán rule, and Hind came under the Imperial sway. 'Adali reigned for nearly three years.

Akbar died on the 13 Jumada-s sani, 1014; 13 Oct. 1605.
This Table, as far as the 46th year, has been drawn up from the Akbar-

This Table, as far as the 46th year, has been drawn up from the Akbarnama of Aba-I Fazi, which is the most accurate of the authorities and most consistent with itself, though it occasionally shows a slight error, as in the 5th year, which must have begun on the 13th, not the 16th of Jumáda-I ákhir. The Tabakái and Badáani go astray at the 22nd year, which began at the end of 984 and ended on the 1st day of 986 Hijra.

Shaikh Abú-l Fazl, in his great work entitled Akbar-náma, has recorded fully and circumstantially all the events in the life of God's vicegerent, from the day of his birth till the present year, the thirty-eighth year of the Iláhí era, and the year 1002 of the Hijra (1593-4 A.D.). But this humble servant of the State, Nizámu-d dín Ahmad Mutasaddi, having written a history of all the kings who have raised the banner of sovereignty in Hindústán, it is indispensable that he should also write a history of all the incidents in the life of the Emperor. The greatness of the theme will probably imbue his mind with ability to perform his undertaking. The history of this great Emperor must be the prominent feature in all books, so that there is little need of the present work, but as I have felt it my duty to write a history of the Sultáns of Hindústán, it seems right to crown my work with a relation of the auspicious reign of this great Emperor.

It will be remembered that in the history of the reign of the late Emperor Humáyún our narrative had reached the point where Prince Akbar was sent to the Siwálik hills along with Bairám Khán Khán-khánán, to crush Sikandar Afghán. When he reached the pargana of Kalánor, one of the dependencies of Lahore, the sad intelligence of the death of the Emperor his father was brought to him, and plunged him in the deepest sorrow. Bairám Khán, commander-in-chief, with the concurrence of the nobles and officers, raised His Highness to the throne in the town of Kalánor at noon-day of Friday, the 2nd of Rabí'u-s sání, 963 h., with all due state and ceremony, and letters of grace and favour were sent to all parts of Hindústán.

First year of the Ilahi.

The Iláhí is a true solar year beginning with the Nau-roz.³ The first year of this auspicious era corresponded with Monday, the 27th Rabí'u-l ákhir, 963 H. (10 March, 1556 A.D.).

² The Persian solar months are used in this ora.

Among the prominent ovents of the early days of the reign was the rebellion of Shah Abu-l Ma'alí. This young man was a descendant of the Saiyids of Turmuz, and was remarkable both for his beauty and intelligence. The late king had a great partiality for him, and this fostered his pride so that presumptness ideas got the mastery over him, and his conduct was marked by some unseemly actions. The Khan-khanan arrested him, and was about to execute him; but the young Emperor was mercifully disposed, and was unwilling that the beginning of his reign should be stained with the execution of a descendant of the Saiyids before any crime had been proved against him. So he placed him in the custody of Pahlawán Kal-gaz kotwal, and sent him to Lahore. Abú-l Ma'alí escaped from custody, and the pahlawan, in shame for his fault, committed suicide.

So long as Sikandar Afghán was in the field, the officers of the Emperor were unable to take any measures for the capture of the fugitive, but sent all their regular forces against Sikandar. The Imperial forces encountered the Afgháns near the Siwálik mountains, and gained a victory which elicited gracious marks of approval from the Emperor.² Sikandar took refuge in the mountains and jungles, and the Imperial forces were engaged for six months in hunting him about and endeavouring to capture him. Rájá Rám Chand,³ Rájá of Nagarkot, was the most renowned of all the rájás of the hills, and he came and made his submission. In consequence of the heavy rains, His Highness left these parts, and went to Jálandhar, where he stayed for five months.

Tardí Beg Khán, who was one of the most famous of the nobles of Humáyún's reign, and held an exalted place in that monarch's estimation, in the same week that the Emperor died, caused the khuiba to be read in Dehlí in the name of the Emperor Akbar.) He also, with the help of Khwája Sultán 'Alí, wasir and mir-munshi, who was also mir-i 'arz and mir-i mál, kept under control the affairs of Dehlí, and of Mewát and other parganas which had but lately been brought under royal antherity. He sent Mirzá Abú-l Kásim, son of Prince Kámrán, along with the effects and establishments and war-elephants of the late Emperor, to his successor, the Emperor Akbar.

When Humáyún marched to Hindústán, he consigned the government of Kábul and Ghazní to Mun'im Khán, one of his chief nobles, and he also made him guardian (atálik) of his son, Mirzá Muhammad Hakím. Ho also left there all his ladios. The city of Kandahár and its dependent territories were tho jägir of Bairám Khán Khán-khánán. By the kindness of His Majesty the government of Badakhshán was consigned to Mirzá Sulaimán, son of Khán Mirzá, son of Sultán Mahmúd, son of Mirzá Sultán Abú Sa'id Gurgán. When the intelligence of the facts (of the death) of Humáyún reached Mirzá Sulaimán, ambitious designs took hold of him, and, with his son Mirzú Ibráhím, he marched against Kábul, and laid siege to it. Mun'im Khán wrote a full report of all the facts of the matter, and sent it to the Emperor. But before his despatch arrived, Akbar had sent Muhammad Kulí Birlás, and some other nobles, to Kábul, to fetch the ladies who had been left there. the news of the siege of Kábul arrived, an imperative farmán was issued, directing these nobles to make all haste to Kabul, and to raise the siege. When these nobles passed the Nilab (Indus), Mirzá Sulaimán saw that he could effect nothing by hostile means, so he employed as an intermediary Kází Khán Badakhshi, who was one of his confidential nobles, and one of the holy men of the time, to inform Mun'im Khan that if his name were recited in the khutba, he would take his departure. Mun'im Khán knew that the garrison of the fort was suffering from the protracted siege, so he consented that the name of Mirzá Sulaimán should be mentioned in the list of the titles (zail i alkáb) of His Majesty the Emperor. When Mirzá Sulaimán was informed of this concession, he immediately departed for Badaklıslıán.

Soon after the accession of the Emperor, 'Ali Kuli Khan' received the title of Khán-zamán and marched towards Sambal to repress Shádí Khán Afghán, one of the nobles of Sultán Muhammad 'Adalí. When he reached the banks of the Rahab, he sent some of his men over the river with 2000 or 3000 horse to reconnoitre the enemy. This detachment crossed the river without eare and circumspection, and Śhádí Khán, perceiving his opportunity, suddenly fell upon them. Many of Khán-zamán's men were killed, and many were drowned in the river. When the Khan received intelligence of this, he consulted with the nobles who were with him, such as * * *, upon the propriety of erossing the river to avenge this disaster. Just at this juncture, letters arrived from Tardí Beg Khán and other nobles who were in Dehlí,2 stating that Himún, the vakil of Muhammad Khán 'Adalí, had approached Dehlí with a large force and many elephants, intent upon battle, and that they should bring up their forces with all possible speed. (Khán-zamán and all the) faithful and prudent nobles marched off instantly towards Dehlí; but before they arrived, Tardí Beg Khán had been defeated) This matter has been recorded among the incidents of the reign of Sultan 'Adali, and there is no need to repeat it here.

When Himun approached Agra, Sikandar Khan Uzbek, the governor of that city, was obliged to evacuate the place and join Tardi Beg Khan. 'Abdu-lla Uzbek, Lal Sultan Badakhshi, 'Ali Kuli Andarabi, Mirak Khan Kolabi, Haidar Muhammad Akhtabegi, and Mirza Kuli Beg Khan assembled. Maulana Pir Muhammad Shirwani also came to Tardi Beg on a mission from Bairam Khan. These all brought reinforcements with them. As Himun drew near to Dehli, the great nobles led their forces ont of the city, and marshalled them in the field in sight of the enemy. Sikandar Khán and 'Abdu-lla Khán Uzbek and Lál Sultán Badakhshí, who were on the right wing, defeated the forces opposed to them. Then Hímún, with a reserve which he had and some fierce elephants, made an attack upon the Mughals, and Tardí Beg Khán, being unable to repel this assault, was obliged to retreat. But although Hímún had thus, by his tactics and artifice, prevailed over Tardí Beg Khán, he did not think of pursuing him. That portion of the enemy's army which had been defeated, finding themselves, to their surprise, unmolested, returned to the scene of action, and then learned that Tardí Beg Khán had been discomfited and put to flight. Hímún then occupied Dehlí, and Tardí Beg Khán and the other nobles proceeded to the Emperor. Khán-zamán joined them at the town of Sirlind.

The Emperor and his followers were engaged at Jálandhar in counteracting the efforts of Sultán Sikandar. When the intelligence of this disaster reached him, he appointed Khwája Khizr Khán, who belonged to the lineage of the Mughal Sultáns, and had married Gulbadan Begam, the aunt of the Emperor, to oppose Sultán Sikandar, while he himself marched to Dehlí. (Upon his reaching the town of Sirhind, the defeated nobles waited upon him. But Khán-khánán, who had the general direction of state affairs, had deemed it desirable to destroy Tardí Beg Khán.) So he had summoned him to his tent, and had caused him to be put to death. He had also placed in confinement Khwája Sultán 'Alí and the Mir Munshi and the Khanjar-beg of Tardí Khán. When the royal tents were pitched,

There had been a long standing quarrel, aggravated by secturian bitterness, between Bairam Khan and Tardi Beg. Badaani (ii. 14) says that Bairam Khan got a kind of permission from the Emperor to put Tardi Beg to death. Abu-l Fazl and Firishta, however, show that he had some difficulty in justifying the act. Firishta states that "he understood from the best informed men of the times, that had Tardi Beg Khan not been executed by way of example, such was the condition of the Mughal army and the general feeling of those foreigners, that the old of Sher Shah would have been acted over again."—Briggs, vol. ii. p. 186.

'Ali Kuli Khan and * * * were sent forward with the advanced forces, and the Emperor followed to confront the enemy)

Himin had greatly vannted his achievements at Dehli, and had taken to himself the title of Raja Bikramajit.\(^1\) He had gathered under his command a mighty force, and had fifteen hundred\(^2\) war-elephants. With these he hastened to meet the Imperial army. He had sent on his artillery\(^3\) in advance, and a detachment of the Emperor's army, which had gone forward, fell in with the artillery at P\u00e4nipat, and took it at the point of the sword. When Himin was informed of this disaster, he was much depressed, but he promised his officers an increase of their emoluments, and gave to each one an elephant on which to ride and exhibit his devotion. He himself mounted an elephant named Haud (wind), and went forth with scowling brow to meet his royal adversary.

On the morning of Friday, [2nd] Muharram, 964 n. (5 November, 1556), the intelligence of his march was brought in from the advanced gnard, and the generals marshalled their forces to receive the attack. Husain Kuli Beg and * * * * other brave officers fought bravely, and defeated their adversaries. Himún then advanced with his elephants, and made such a determined charge on the Imperial army that the left wing was shaken. But by the exertions of the brave archers and by resolute use of spear and sword, firmness was restored. Himún then drew off his forces, and made an assault upon the centre, which was under the command of Khán-zamán. He led all his elephants against the Khán's men, who received him with showers of arrows. An arrow pierced the eye of Hímún, and came out at the back of his head. When those who were fighting under him saw his condition, their hands were paralyzed, and they broke. The Imperial forces pursued them, and cut many to pieces.

^{.2} Alfi augments the number to "nearly three thousand, a number that for many a long year had not been gathered together in India," and adds that more than a thousand were captured. Abú-l Fazl (ii. p. 50) and Badauni (ii. p. 16) say that 1500 were captured.

The elephant on which Himún was riding, when Himún fell wounded in the houda and its driver was killed, made off towards the jungle. It so happened that Sháh Kuli Khán fell in with this elephant, and made his own driver mount it. The driver then perceived that there was a man lying wounded in the houda, and upon examination this person proved to be Himún himself. Sháh Kuli Khán, fully alive to the importance of his discovery, drove the elephant, along with several others which had been captured in the field, to the presence of the Emperor. Bairám Kháu Khán-khánán then put Himún to death with his own haud.

Sikandar Khán Uzbek, according to orders, pursued the fugitives to Dehlí, and sent many of them to hell. Next day the army marched from Pánípat, and without halting anywhere went straight to Dehlí. All the inhabitants of the city of every degree came forth to give His Majesty a suitable reception, and to conduct him with due honour into the city. He remained there one month. Intelligence was brought in that all the children and dependents of Hímún, with his treasures and effects, were

² Badauni, Abu-I Fazl and Faizi all state that Bairam Khan killed Himu after having failed to induce the Emperor to do so. Bairam Khan said, according to Badauni, "'This is your first war (ghaza), prove your sword on this infidel, for it will be a meritorious deed.' Akbar replied, 'He is now no better than a dead man, how can I strike him? If he had sense and strength, I would try my sweether, in the presence of them all, the Khan, as a warrior of the faith, cut him his sword." in Mewát: so Mauláná Pír Muhammad Shírwání was sent thither. He captured all the persons, and took possession of all the treasures and valuables, and conducted them to the foot of the throne.

Second year of the Reign.

The beginning of this year corresponded with Tuesday, the 9th Jumáda-l awwal, 964 H. (10 March, 1557). Intelligence arrived that Khizr Khán Khwája² had been defeated³ by Sikandar Afghán; the Emperor therefore set out for Lahore, to oppose the victor. When he reached Jálandhar, Sikandar fell back to the Siwálik hills, and the royal forces pursued him to Dísawa,⁴ and from thence to Damharí. It now became obvious that Sikandar meant to retreat, and had no intention of fighting. A party of distinguished nobles was sent in pursuit, and by rapid marches came up to the camp of Sikandar. He then shut himself up in the fort of Mánkot.⁵ The Imperial army followed, and laid siege to the fort. Day by day the batteries were advanced, and the garrison was closely pressed.

At this time Her Highness Mariam Makaní, mother of the Emperor, with other royal ladies, arrived in Hindústán from Kábul, to the great satisfaction of the Emperor. Muhammad Kulí Birlás, Shamsu-d dín Muhammad Khán Atka, and the other great nobles who had been sent to assist Mun'im Khán at Kábul against Mirzá Sulaimán, at the same time returned to Hindústán to the service of their master. When the ladies were about the distance of a stage from the Imperial camp, the Emperor left Bairám Khán in command of the army, and went forth to meet them, his heart receiving great comfort from the reunion.

(After a prolonged siege, Sikandar Afghán, being hard pressed, requested that some confidential noble might be sent in to arrange terms with him.2 The Emperor commissioned Atka Khan to perform this duty. When he entered the fortress, Sikandar addressed him in very deprecatory terms, confessing that he had been very bold and presumptuous, and that he knew he had no chance in resistance. He begged that he might be permitted to retire to Bengal, promising to remain faithful in his allegiance, and offering to leave his son as a hostage. Atka Khán returned, and reported these proposals, through Pír Muhammad Khán, to the Khán-khánán, and upon his communicating them to the Emperor, they were graciously approved. Sikandar accordingly sent his son, 'Abdu-r Rahmán, along with Ghází Khán Súr, and he also sent with them several war-elephants and various articles of tribute. So on the 27th Ramazán, 964, the fort was surrendered to the royal forces.3 On the 2nd Shawwal the army marched on its return towards Lahore. After four months and fourteen days the army marched from Lahore on its return to Delilí.

One day, while the army was lying before Mánkot, His Majesty had two elephants, named respectively Fatúhá and Bakhshá, brought out to fight for his amusement; and as the animals pressed each other, they approached very close to the tent of Khán-khánán. It so happened that the Khán was ill, and confined to his bed with boils. The suspicion came into his mind that the elephants were perhaps directed thither by the royal servants, and this idea was encouraged by the people who were around him. So he sent a person to the Emperor to inquire what fault his detractors had imputed to him, that he should have been subjected to this mark of the royal displeasure. After roturning to Lahore Khán-khánán still harped upon this matter; and sending for Shamsu-d dín Muhammad Atka, he told him his suspicion, that this unkind action of His Majesty had been instigated by him. (When Atka Khán heard this charge, he was much distressed; so he took all his sons with him to the house of Khán-khánán, and by taking an oath upon the Kurán removed his suspicions.²

² Abú-l Fazl and Faizi say that the defeat and death of 'Adalí had its effect in bringing about the surrender.—Akbar-nama, vol. if. pp. 72-73. See supra, p. 245.

After four months and fourteen days, the army marched from Lahore to Dehlí. Upon reaching Jálandhar a halt was made, and Khán-khánán was married to Sultán Begam, daughter of Mirzá Núru-d dín, who was a son of the sister of the late Emperor Humáyún. The Emperor Humáyún, during his lifetime, had promised her to the Khán-khánán, and now, under tho orders of the Emperor Akbar, the union was accomplished. Khán-khánán gave a splendid banquet, to which he invited His Majesty, who was graciously pleased to honour it with his presence. The Khán was profuse in his generosity on the occasion. At tho beginning of the third year of the Iláhí, the army recommenced its march for Dehlí.

Third year of the Reign.

The beginning of this year coincided with Tuesday, 20th Jumáda-l awwal, 965 m. (10th March, 1558), and on the 25th Jumáda-s sání His Majesty arrived at Dehlí. He then turned his attention to the concerns of his subjects and army, and instice and mercy held a prominent place in his conneils. The Khán-khánán, in concert with the ministers and nobles of the State, used to attend twice a week in the diwan-khánah, and transact business under the directions and commands of His Majesty!

[Infatuation of Khán-zamán for one of the royal troopers.]

In this year Musahib Khan, son of Khwaja Kalan Beg, one of the principal nobles of the late Emperor, was put to death by order of the Khan-khanan, because he had shown great ill-feeling and malice towards the Khan.

One day in this year His Majesty went out riding on an elephant ealled Lakhna, and as he was going along, the animal rushed after another elephant. It so happened that he came to a ditch into which he stumbled, and the Emperor was thrown from his seat on the neck of the animal, but his foot was eaught in the rope 1 which was tied round the beast's neck. The man who was riding behind him came to the ground, but His Majesty elung to the rope until a number of persons collected and released his foot. The elephant extricated himself by his own strength, and His Majesty again mounted him and returned home. After the expiration of six months the Emperor embarked in a boat and fell down to Agra, where he arrived on the 17th Muharram, 966 H. (30th Oct., 1558), in the third year of the Háhí.²

One of the most important incidents of this year was that relating to Mauláná Pír Muhammad Shirwání. The Pír was the general manager (wakil-i mullak) of the Khán-khánán,3 and

^{2 &}quot;He took up his residence in the citadel (ark) of the city which was called

Badüüni relates that the Khün-khünün and Pir Muhammad were one day out hunting together, and that the former being hungry, the Pir entertained him and his suite. To the great astonishment of the Khün, Pir Muhammad's hunting equipage supplied thirty (three?) hundred goblets of sherbet and eight hundred dishes of food.—Badüüni, vol. ii. p. 26.

all the business of the State passed through his hands. Ho was the person to whom the nebles and officers had to make their applications, and of the many, high and low, who attended at his door, he admitted hardly any one. His temper now became so arrogant and perverted that for some days he would not come out of his house. The Kháu-khánán went to call upon him as upon a siek person. The slave asked the Khán-khánán to wait until he had made known his wish to the Pir. This greatly incensed the Khán-khánán. When Pir Muhammad was informed of what had passed, he rushed out, and made many apologies to the Khán-khánán, who told him how the slave had refused him admission. The Pir made the excuse that the slave did not know him. Khán-khánán asked him how he knew what the slave thought. But for all that had passed, when the Khánkhánán went in, his servants were not permitted to attend him, excepting Tálir Muhammad Sultán, Mir-i farághat, who made his way in to look after his master. The Khán-khánán sat for a while; but when he came out, he thought over this conduct of Pir Muhammad. After a few days he sent Khwaja Aminu-d daula Mahmúd, subsequently Khwája-i Jahán, Mír 'Abdu-lla Bakhshí, Khwája Muhammad Husain Bakhshí, and several other of his followers, to Pir Muhammad Khan, with this message: "Formerly you were a poor student, and came to Kandahar in a needy, forlorn condition; but I perceived some signs of excollence in you, and romembered some old services. I therefore advanced you to the dignity of Khán and Sultán. But your nature is unable to bear this great advancement, and the bad points in your character get the mastery of you. I therefore think it advisable to deprive you for a time of royal distinctions and dignity, so that you may como to your proper senses. You must return your banner, kettle-drum, and all other marks of honour. J So all signs of dignity were immediately taken away from him, and he became simple Pir Muhammad. Some days afterwards he was taken to the fort of Bayána, under Khán-khánán's orders, and from thence was sent to Mecca; but he proceeded to Gujarát, and there remained until after the fall of Bairám Khán, when he returned to Court.

The office of vakil to Khán-khánán, which was thus taken from Pír Muhammad, was given to Hájí Muhammad Sístání, who was one of the Khán's servants. At this time the dignity of Sadárat-i mamálik (office of Lord Chief Justice) was conferred upon Shaikh Gadáí, son of Shaikh Jamál Kambú of Dehlí, through the interest of Khán-khánán, who remembered the kindness which he had received from the Shaikh during the time of his exile in Gujarát.¹ The honour thus conferred gave the Shaikh precedence over the grandees (akábir) of Hindústán and Khurásán. At the same period also that pattern of great men, Mír 'Abdu-l Latíf Kazwíní, was appointed tutor to His Majesty, and His Majesty used often to read with him ghasals in mystic language.²

The fort of Gwalior was celebrated for its height and strength, and had always been the home of great rajás. After the time of Salím Khán (Islám Sháh) the fort had been placed in the charge of Suhail, one of his ghuláms, by Sultán Muhammad 'Adalí. When the throne of Akbar had been established at Agra, Habíb 'Alí Sultán, Maksúd 'Alí Kor, and Kiyá Khán were sent to take the fort. They invested it for some days, and the garrison being in distress surrendered.

Fourth year of the Reign.

The beginning of this year corresponded with Friday, the 2nd Jumáda-l ákhir, 966 H. (10th March, 1559 A.D.). In this year Khán-zamáu was sent to reduce Jaunpûr, the capital of the Sharkiya kings, which was now in possession of the Afgháns. He accordingly marched thither with a large force, and having won great victories, he annexed that country to the Imperial dominions. In this year Habib 'Ali Khán was sont against the fort of Rantambher. During the rule of Sher Khán Afghán this fort was under the charge of Hájí Khán, one of his ghuláms, and this Hájí Khán had now sold the fort to Ráí Surjan, a relation (az khíshán) of Ráí Udí Singh, who held great power in these parts. He had brought all the parganas under his rule, and had enforced his authority. Habíb 'Alí, with his army, invested the fort, and ravaged all the neighbourhood; the anitrs then departed to their júgirs.

Shaikh Mnhammad Ghaus arrived at Agra from Gnjarát; but as a memoir of the Shaikh is given among the memoirs of the shaikhs of the age in this work, it is unnecessary to dilate upon the subject here. To be brief, in the year 966, the Shaikh arrived with his disciples and a large party at Agra, and was honoured with a royal reception. But there was ill-feeling between him and Shaikh Gadáí, and Shaikh Gadáí held great ascendancy over Khán-khánán; the consequence was that Shaikh Muhammad did not receive that attention from the Khán-khánán that he had expected. He was greatly annoyed at this, and went off to Gwalier, which was his place of residence, and there remained until the end of his days, discharging the duties of a Shaikh. His Majesty settled upon him one kror (of tankas?) as a pension.

At this time, while the Court was at Agra, Bahadur Khan,3 brother of Khan-zaman, marched to effect the conquest of Malwa, which had formerly belonged to the Khilji monarchs, but which had been brought into subjection by Baz Bahadur, son of Shuja' Khan Afghan. He had reached the town of Siri when the agitation arose about Bairam Khan, and under the orders of the Khan he returned.

Fifth year of the Reign.

The beginning of this year was Saturday, 16th Jumáda-l ákhir, 967 m. (10th March, 1560 A.D.). (The general management of Imperial affairs was under the direction of Bairám Khán; but there were envious malignant men, who were striving to ingratiate themselves in His Majesty's favour, who lost no opportunity of speaking an ill word to pervert the mind of the Emperor.) Prominent among these men was Adham Khán, who, being the son of Maham Anka, held a higher position than all the other conrtiers. In accord with his mother, he constantly showed his malice; but Khán-khánán's wisdom and ability were so manifest, that Adham's ill-natured observations did not meet with the royal approval. But at length, on the 8th Jumáda-s sání, 967 n., His Majesty crossed the river Junna on a hunting expedition, and Khán-khánán remained behind at Agra in charge of the government. His Majesty reached the town of Sikandar, half way to Dehlí. At this time Shahábn-d dín Ahmad Khán Naishapúrí2 held the government of Dehlí, and Mer Highness Mariam Makani, mother of the Emperor, was in that city. Máham Anka, who was related to Shahábu-d dín Ahmad Khán,¹ settled in her own mind that the best thing she could do was to incite the Emperor to proceed to Dehlí, where, in collusion with Shahábu-d dín Ahmad, she (Anka) might settle what was the best course to pursue. In furtherance of this plan, she represented to the Emperor that Her Highness Mariam Makání was in a weak ailing state, and had a great desire to see him. This statement distressed the Emperor, and he determined to go on to Dehlí.² Shahábu-d dín came out in state to meet His Majesty, and was graciously received.

2 See Blochmann's Aln-i Akbarl, vol. i. p. 332.

Máham Anka, in agreement with Shahábu-d dín, seized every opportunity of saying something to set the mind of the Emperor against Bairám Khán. Thus, she³ insinuated that so long as Bairám Khán was in power, the Emperor would have no will of his own over the affairs of State,—that the whole power was in the Khán's hands, and His Majesty was under his control. At length she said that when Khán-khánán discovered that she had been the cause of the Emperor's proceeding to Dchlí, he would have a grudge against her, and that she was quite unable to contend against his animosity. She therefore begged His Majesty to give her leave to proceed to Mecca, so that at the holy city she might offer up prayers for His Majesty in absence, instead of serving him in presence. The assiduous attention of Máham Anka had won the regard of the Emperor, and he would not listen to the suggestion of separation from her. He said he would request Khán-khánán to overlook her offence, and he sent a message to the Khán to this effect: "As I have come all this way without consulting you, my attendants have fallen under your suspicion. Now you must make yourself quite at ease about them, so that you may continue to serve me with a tranquil mind." Shahábu-d dín Ahmad was very vigilant and cautious in his proceedings. He began to strengthen the fortifications, and took every precaution to get a control over State affairs: all the while exerting himself, in concert with Máham Anka, to set the attendants of the Emperor against the minister.

Khán-khánán, on receiving the Emperor's message, sent Khwája Amínu-d dín Mahmúd Hájí Muhammad Sistání and Tarsún Beg,¹ who held important offices, to Dehlí, to wait upon His Majesty, with this statement: "The devotion and loyalty of your servant would never allow him to do anything to any servant of the State against His Majesty's wishes; for nought but kindness and favour is due to all those who faithfully discharge their duties."

The royal ears had been filled with injurious stories and statements against Khán-khánán, so the Khán's message did not receive His Majesty's approval, and the messengers were sent back. When the report of His Majesty's displeasure with Khán-khánán became public, all men turned their backs upon him, and their faces towards the Emperor. Among the first who were admitted to royal favour was Kiyá Khán Gang.² Shahábu-d dín Ahmad Khán, with the assistance of Máham Anka, inspired every one who came to Court with the hope of receiving dignities and jágárs suitable to their condition.

Khán-khánán had long entertained a desire to go on pilgrimage to the holy places. He informed the amirs and kháns who still held to him of the project he had formed, and then quitted the Imperial service. He sent along with these men Bahádur Khán, whom he had called from Málwa, and leaving Agra,³ he proceeded towards Nágor on his pilgrimage to the holy places. When he arrived at Bayána, he set at liberty Muhammad Amín Díwána, who was there confined, and sent him to Court. As soon as intelligence of Khán-khánán's

³ He left Agra for Nagor on the 12th Rajab, and on reaching Bayana he liberated Shah Aba-1 Ma'ali, and Muhammad Amin Diwana, directing them to proceed to the Emperor. departure from Agra arrived, Shahabu-d dín Ahmad Khan and Maham Anka represented to His Majesty that he had left Agra with the intention of attacking the Panjab. His Majesty then sent Mír 'Abdu-l Latíf to the Khan-khanan with this message: "As I was fully assured of your honesty and fidelity, I left all important affairs of State in your charge, and thought only of my own pleasures. I have now determined to take the reins of government into my own hands, and it is desirable that you should now make the pilgrimage to Mecca, upon which you have been so long intent. A suitable jägtr out of the parganas of Hindústán shall be assigned for your maintenance, the revenues of which shall be transmitted to you by your agents."

Whon Mir 'Abdu-l Latif communicated this message to Khankhánán, he listened attentively, and having parted from the Mír, he lest Mewát on his way to Nágor. Of all his followers there now remained with him only Wali Beg Zú-1 Kadar, his sons Husain Kuli Beg and Isma'il Kuli Beg, who were relations of his, Shuh Kuli Malırim, Husain Khun his sister's son, and his son-in-law Mahdí Kásim Khán. Upon reaching Nagor, he sent his banner, kettle-drnms, and all other marks of nobility, to the Emperor by the hands of Husain Kulí Beg. The Emperor had left Dohlí, and was proceeding towards the Panjáb.1 He had reached the pargana of Jhajhar when Husain Kulí Beg waited upon him. Among the persons present (with the Beg) was Sháh Abú-l Ma'álí, who, being mounted on horseback, endeavoured to overtake His Majesty. This greatly effended the Emperor, who ordered the culprit into confinement, and placed him in the custody of Shahabu-d din Ahmad. The surrender of the banner and the other insignia of nebility gratified the Emperor.

Pír Muhammad Khán Shirwání, whom the Khán-khánán had banished from the country and sent to Mecca, had waited in Gujarát for the proper season (of sailing). On hearing of the disgrace of the Khán-khánán, he returned to Court with all possible speed. He met with a very gracious reception, and was honoured with the title "Násiru-l Mulk," as well as with a banner and kettle-drums. He was then sent with a force to hasten Khán-khánán's departure for Mecca, and accordingly marched after him. After this His Majesty returned to Dehlí, and a farmán was issued, summoning Mun'im Khán from Kábul.

As Mál Deo Rájá of Joudhpúr held a strong and threatening position in the way to Gujarát, with the intention of attacking Bairám Khán, the Khán delayed his movements, and eventually marched from Nágor towards Bikanír. Ráí Kalyán Mál and his son Ráí Sing,¹ who were the sámindárs of that country, received him with great kindness, and treated him most hospitably. After staying there a few days, and resting from the fatigues of the journey, he learnt that Pír Muhammad Khán had been sent to pursue him, and this greatly annoyed and distressed him. Some evil-minded persons, having found their opportunity, played upon the feelings of the Khán-khánán, and inciting him to rebellious acts, he went towards the Panjáb.

When he arrived at the fort of Tabarhindh (Sirhind), which was the jágir of Sher Muhammad Díwána, one of his old servants, to whom he had shown great kindness, in full confidence of his faithfulness, Khán-khánán left there his son Mirzá Khán ['Abdu-r Rahím], who was then in the third year of his age, but who is at the present day exalted to the dignity of Khán-khánán and sipáh-salár (commander-in-chief). He also left his females and property, and proceeded on his course. Sher Muhammad thereupon appropriated all the property, and treated the dependents of the Khán-khánán with great indignity. The Khán-khánán was in the pargana of Dípálpúr when he was informed of these proceedings. He sent his diván Khwája Muzaffar Alí (who afterwards became Muzaffar Khán³) along with Darwesh Muhammad Uzbek to expestulate and intereedo with Sher Muhammad, but the latter seized Muzaffar 'Alí, and sent him prisoner to the Emperor. Sorely troubled by these acts, the Khán went on to Jálandhar.

On the Emperor being informed of Khán-khánán's advance towards the Panjáb, ho despatched Shamsu-d dín Muhammad Khán Atka,1 his son Yúsuf Khán,2 Husain Khán a relation of Shahábu-d dín Ahmad Khán, and a body of nobles to the Panjáb. When the royal forces reached the town of Dagdár,3 and proceeded from theneo to the pargana of Koná,4 thoy liemnied in Khán-khánán, so that he was obliged to fight. Compelled to action, he drew up his forces, and confronted the royal army. A sharp action ensued, with considerable loss to both sides,5 and Khán-khánán, being defeated, fled towards the Siwálik hills. Walí Beg Zú-l Kadar and his son Isma'íl Kulí Beg (who now holds a position among the great nobles), Ahmad Beg, Ya'kúb Beg Hamadání, and all his brothers, were taken prisoners, and great booty fell into the hands of the royal troops. This victory was gained in the fifth year of the Iláhí, agreeing with 967 A.II.

After Shamsu-d dín Muhammad Khán Atka had marched for the Panjáb, the Emperor left Khwája 'Abdu-l Majíd Harawí (who had been admitted to the position of a minister (silk i wuzarā), and had been honoured with the title of Ksaf Khán, in charge of Dehlí, and on the 2nd Zí-l ka'da, 967, himself marched to the Panjáb. He placed Husain Kulí Beg, son of Walí Zú-l Kadar, by way of precaution, in custody of Ksaf Khán, with directions to treat him generously, and do him no harm. When the Emperor reached Jálandhar, Mun'im Khán, who had been summoned from Kábul, arrived, and was accompanied by Mukím Khán, sister's son of Tardí Beg Khán, and several other amirs. Mun'im Khán was raised to the dignity of minister (wakálat), and received the title of Khán-khánán, and the nobles in his company received favours and honours suitable to their respective positions.

At this place Akbar received the intelligence of the victory gained by Shamsu-d dín Muhammad Khán. Those who had been taken prisoners in that engagement were brought into the royal presence captive and forlorn, and were committed to safe custody. One of the number, Wali Beg, who had received a severe wound, died in prison. So his head was cut off and sent to Dehlí. The Emperor then marched onwards toward tho Siwálik hills,2 in pursuit of the Khán-khánán. He reached the neighbourhood of Talwara, a district in the Siwalik, belonging to Rájá Gobind³ Chand, where the Khán-khánán had sought refuge. A party of adventurous soldiers dashed forward into the hills, and surrounding the place put many of the defenders to the sword. Sultan Husain Jalair was killed in the action. When they brought his head into the presence of the Khánkhánán, in a burst of feeling he exclaimed, "This life of mine is not worth so much, that a man like this should be killed in my defence." Depressed and anxious, the Khán instantly sent ono of his followers, Jamál Khán, to the Emperor with this messago: "I deeply repent my deeds, which have not been entirely under my own control; but if I am favoured with the royal clemency,

I will throw the veil of oblivion over my misdeeds, and will present myself in your presence, and hope for your forgiveness."

When this message was brought to the ears of the Emperor, the recollection of old services rose up in his memory, and he gave orders that Mauláná 'Abdu-lla Sultánpári, who had received the title of Makhdumu-l Mulk, should proceed, with several other attendants of the Court, to Khán-khánán, and having assured him of the Emperor's kindly feeling, should bring him to his presence.1 When the Khán-khánán approached the royal camp, all the amirs and khans went out, by the Emperor's order, to meet him, and conducted him to the Emperor with every mark of honour. On his coming into the royal presence, the Khán placed his sad countenance upon the ground of supplication, and craved forgiveness for his offences. The Emperor received him with the most princely grace, and presented him with a splendid robe of honour. Two days afterwards, he gave him permission to depart on a pilgrimage to Mecca² and the holy places. The royal camp then moved on its return to Dehli, and the Emperor went towards Hisár-Fírozah hunting.

Khán-khánán, with his people, took the road to Gujarát. He reached the city of Pattan, in Gujarát, and there rested for some days. This city was then under the government of Músa Khán Lodí Puládí. Khán-khánán went about examining the city, and one day he went out to the Kolábí (lake), a place within sight of the city, and famous for Sahasnak.³ They eall it in the Hindí language Nará. A temple Ránámand, like a thousand temples, stood there, and gave it celebrity. After visiting this place, he went about (the lake) in a boat. When he disembarked and returned home, an Afghán, named Mubárak Khán Lohání, whose father had been killed in an action with the Mughals,1 came to wait upon the Khan-khanan, with the intention of wreaking vengeance upon him. When they were shaking hands, he assassinated him with his dagger.2 The words "Muhammad Bairam" contain the date of this murder. Some scoundrels then plundered the encampment of the deceased. Muhammad Amín Díwána and Bábá Zambúr, with several of the eunuchs, rescued from the fray Mirzá 'Abdu-r Rahím, the son of the Khán-khánán,3 who was then a child of only four years of age, but in these days has been exalted to the dignity of Khánkhánán. They conducted the boy to Ahmadábád, and from thence they carried him to the Court of the Emperor, in the hope of obtaining his protection. The Emperor received the child with the most princely favour, and the good qualities which he exhibited so won upon the Emperor's mind, that his prosperity went on growing until he attained the dignity of Khán-khánán.

When the Khán-khánán (Bairám Khán) went to Gujarát, the Emperor proceeded towards Hisár-Fírozah on a hunting excursion, but the army was sent on to Dehlí, the capital, by the direct route. Having hunted with some leashes of a kind of leopard, which is called chita in Hindí, on the 4th Rabí'u-lawwal, 968 H. (9th Nov., 1560), he arrived at Dehlí, and there stopped awhile for a little rest and enjoyment. On the 2nd Rabí'u-s sání he started for Agra by boat, and arrived there on the 12th of the same month.

Sixth year of the Reign.

The beginning of this year was Sunday, 24th Jumáda-l ákhir, 968 н. (10th March, 1561). In this year the marriage of Muhanımad Báki Khán was celebrated with a lady whose family connexions have been explained in another place. The ceremony was performed with great magnificence, and was followed by rejoicings and feasting for several days.

In the days of Sher Khan the country of Malwa had been held by Shujá'at Khún,1 who was one of his own clan (Khússa khail), and after his death it had come into the hands of his son Báz Bahádur. It now came to His Majesty's knowledge that Báz Bahádar had given himself up to sensuality,2 and cared nothing for the country. Tyrannical and overbearing men had consequently oppressed the poor and helpless, and the peasantry and people had been reduced to distress. The honour of the Imperial throno required that this country should be again brought under its control, and find peace and security. So Adham Khún, Pir Muhammad Khún, Sádik Khán, Kiya Khán Gang, 'Abdu-lla Khán Uzbek, Shah Muhammad Kandahári, and some other amirs, were nominated to effect the conquest of that country.3 They accordingly marched thither, and when they came within ten kos of Sárangpúr in that country, Báz Bahadur, who was in that city, awoko from his slumber of neglect, and took up a position, which he fortified, two kos from the city.

Báz Bahádur was the most accomplished man of his day in the science of music and in Hindí song. He spent much of his time in the society of singers and musicians. When the Imperial army was at ten kos from Sárangpúr, Adham Khán sent forward an advanced force to the entrenchments which Báz Bahádur had thrown up around his army. Several attempts were made to entice him out of his lines, and the royal forces drew together in order to surround him. Báz Bahádur then threw off his apathy, and marched out to give battle. But the Afghán nobles in his army were disaffected, and made their escape, and he himself was obliged to take flight. Rúp-matí, his favourite wife, who used to recite poetry, several other wives, and all his treasure fell into the hands of the Imperial forces. As the fugitives were making off, a cunuch of Báz Bahádur's wounded Rúp-matí with a sword, to provent her falling into the hands of strangers; and when Adham Khán summoned her to his presence, she took poison and killed herself.

Adham Khán wrote an account of the victory to the Emperor. He retained all the ladies and musicians and singers, but he sent some elephants, under chargo of Sádik Khán, to Court. This retention of the ladies and other spoils displeased the Emperor, and made him deem it necessary to proceed in person to Málwa. On the 21st Sha'bán, 968 II., the Emperor left Agra, and marched towards Málwa. When he reached the fort of Gágrún, which is celebrated among the fortresses of Málwa for its strength and height, he gave orders for its reduction. But the commandant of the fort hastened to surrender, and presented his tribute. This greatly pleased the Emperor, who made a forced march in the night, and arrived by dawn in the vicinity of Sárangpúr.1 Adham Khán had left Sárangpúr in order to besiege Gágrún, so he met the Emperor at three kos distance from that place,2 and was graciously received. Then they rode on to the city, and Adham Klián's abode was given up to His Majesty. Adham Khán now collected all his spoils, and presented them to the Emperor, who stayed a few days to refresh and enjoy himself, and then returned to Agra.

At that place Pir Muhammad Khán Shirwáni and other nobles who had jágirs in Málwa, waited upon the Emperor. They were honoured with gifts of robes and horses, and were then sent back to their jágirs. When the Emperor was near Narwar, a formidable tiger came out of the jungle. The Emperor slowly approached the beast, and with one blow of his sword brought her to the ground. Some of his attendants killed the young ones with swords and spears.

Muhammad Asghar, mir-munshi, who was celebrated for the beauty of his writing and composition, was now appointed Mir-munshi, and received the title of Ashraf Khán. On the 29th Ramazán, 968, the Court reached Agra.

When 'Adalí, the Afghan, was slain by the sons of Muhammad Khán Bangálí, who was one of the nobles of Salím Khán Afghán, 'Adalí's son, Sher Khán, took his seat upon the throne of Government, in the fort of Chunár, and then led an army to attempt the conquest of Jaunpúr. Thereupon Khán-zamán sent information to the Imperial Court, and the amirs who held jágirs in that part of the country were commanded to support Khán-zamán. Ibráhim Khán Uzbek, Majnún Khán Kákshál, Sháham Khán Jaláir, Kamál Khán Gakhar, and many other chiefs, in obedienco to the royal order, joined Kulí Khán (Khán-zamán).² The Afgháns, having crossed the river, gave battle, but Khán-zamán exerted himself gallantly, and put them to flight.

Various actions of Khán-zamán oxcited a suspicion of his intention to rebel, so towards the close of the year His Majesty proceeded towards Jaunpúr, on a progress of hunting and pleasure. On approaching Kálpí, the camp was about to be pitched, when 'Abdu-lla Khán Uzbek, who held Kálpí in jágír, came forward, and begged His Majesty to honour his house by taking up his quarters there. The proposal was graciously accepted, and 'Abdu-lla Khán rendered the services due from him, and presented his offerings, for which he was honoured by His Majesty's approbation.

When the Court reached Karra, 'Ali Kuli Khán Khán-zamán

and his brother Bahádur Khán came up by forced marches from their jágir of Jaunpúr, and on being received, they presented suitable offerings. Their fidelity and services being recognized, they received presents of horses and robes, and were then dismissed to their jágirs. On the 17th Zí-l hijja, of the sixth year of the Iláhí, corresponding with 968 H., the Court reached Agra.

Shamsu-d din Muhammad Atka, who bore the title of Khán-i 'asam, and held the government of the Panjáh, now came to Court. He was graciously received, and the direction of the affairs of the State was committed to his charge. About the same time, Adham Khán, in obedience to a royal command, came from Málwa to the capital, and was welcomed with due honour.

On the 8th Jumáda-l awwal, 969 H., the Emperor started to pay a visit to the tomb of Kutbu-l auliyá Khwája Mu'ínu-d dín Chishtí.³ When he reached the town of Sámbar, Rájá Bihárí Mal,⁴ one of the chief rájás of that country, came with great loyalty and respect, along with his son Bhagwán Dás,⁵ to pay

He and his family played d stinguished parts in the reign of Akbar, and intermarried with the Imperial family. His four brothers were named Paran, Rupsi, Askaran, and Jag Mal. He had three sons in Akbar's service, Bhagwan Das, Jagannath, and Salhadi; the first of whom was a most distinguished officer, and on one occasion saved the Emperor's life. He is also called Bhagwan and Bhagwant Das. The son of the latter, named Man Sing, was no less distinguished, and attained the highest rank.—See Blochmann's Ain-i Akbari, vol. i. pp. 328, 333, 339.

his services to His Majesty. He was received with great honour and attention, and his daughter, an honourable lady, was accepted by His Majesty, and took her place among the ladies of the Court. From thence he proceeded to Ajmír, and he dispensed many gifts and pensions among the inhabitants of that noble city. Mirzá Sharafu-d dín Husain, who held a jágir in the territory of Ajmír, came to pay his homage. He was sent with several other amirs of that province to effect the conquest of the fort of Mirtha, about twenty kos from Ajmír, which was held by Jai Mal. His Majesty then started for Agra, and making forced marches, he performed the distance, one hundred and twenty kos, in a day and night.

Se. nth year of the Reign.

The beginning of this year corresponded with Tuesday, 7th Rajab, 969 H. (10 March, 1562). At the beginning of this year Mirzá Sharafu-d dín Husain besieged the fort of Mírtha, being assisted by Shah Bidagh Khan,4 and his son 'Abdu-l Matlab Khán, Muhammad Husain Shaikh, and some other nobles. Great exertions were made on both sides, but at length it was agreed that the garrison should march out with their horses and arms (kamchi), but leave behind all their property and effects. When the victorious army went to take possession of the fort, Jai Mal marched out with his men. But Deo-das, in shame and pride, set fire to the property which was in the fortress, and then sallied forth at the head of a party of Rájpúts, and passed in front of the royal army. Mirzá Sharafu-d dín and other nobles followed Deo-dás, and when they came up with him, he turned round and attacked them. Many of the royal soldiers fell, and nearly 200 Rájpúts were slain. Deo-dás himself was unhorsed, and being overtaken as he lay upon the ground, he was cut to pieces. The fort of Mirtha was then occupied by the Imperial forces.

About this time Pir Muhammad Khán,2 who, after the departure of Adham Khán, held the government of Málwa, assembled the forces of that province, and marched to subdue the countries of Asír and Burhánpúr. He laid siege to Bíjágarh, the principal of all the fortresses of that country, which he took by storm, and put all the garrison to the sword.3 He then marched against Asír, a well-known place in Khándesh. Crossing the river Nerbadda, he gave many of the towns and villages to the sword and destruction, and came to Burhánpúr. That city also he took by storm, and gave orders for a general massacre. Many of the learned men and saiyids of the place he caused to be decapitated in his presence. The governors of Asir and . Burhánpúr, and Báz Bahádur, who lived in this vicinity since his flight from Málwa, now concerted together, and, assisted by all the samindars of the country, they assembled a force with which they assailed Pir Muhammad Khán.4 Unable to resist, Pir Muhammad fled towards Mandú, and when he came to the Nerbadda, he, and all the nobles with him, plunged into its waters. It so happened that a camel came up and bit the horse upon which he was riding. He was thrown off into the water and drowned, thus receiving the recompense of his deeds.5 The other nobles, on reaching Málwa, found that the country was lost, so they pursued their course to the Court of the Emperor.

As his men "were pursuing their straggling march homewards, laden with spell, Pir Muhammad made an attempt to beat off the pursuers, but he was ill supported,"—Akbar-nama, vol. ii. p. 213.

Badauni (vol. ii. p. 51) is eloquent upon the subject: "By way of water he went to fire; and the sighs of orphans, poor wretches, and captives noticed like handlesse."

Báz Bahádur pursued them, and brought the whole of Málwa once more into his power. The amirs who had abandoned Málwa, and had come to Court without orders, were imprisoned for a time, and then set at liberty.

'Abdu-lla Khán Uzbek now received orders to retrieve this disaster in Málwa, and Mu'ínu-d dín Ahmad Khán Farankhúdí, and several other Kháns, were directed to assist him. Towards the end of the year 969 H. (1562 A.D.), 'Abdu-lla and his auxiliaries entered Málwa, and Báz Bahádur, being unable to withstand him, took to flight.' A force was sent in pursuit, and coming up with the fugitives, killed many of them. Báz Bahádur found protection for some time with Ráná Udi Sing, one of the chief rájás of Márwár, and afterwards he repaired to Gujarát, but eventually he threw himself upon the mercy of the Emperor, and sought a refuge from the frowns of fortune. 'Abdu-lla Khán remained at Mandú, and the other amirs returned to their jágirs. Mu'ín Khán, after setting the affairs of the country in order, returned to Court.

An intimacy and friendship had existed between the late Emperor Humáyún and Sháh Tahmásp Súfí of Persia. When Humáyún died, and was succeeded by Akbar, the Sháh was desirous of keeping up friendly relations. He accordingly sent his nephew, Saiyid Beg, son of Ma'súm Beg, to whom he gave the title Ummú-úghlí (uncle's son), as his ambassador, with costly presents. When Saiyid Beg approached A'gra, many kháns and great men were sent forth to meet him, and to bring him into the city with suitable honours. The sum of seven lacs of tankas was appropriated to him. He remained at A'gra two months, and having received a horse and a robe, he took his departure, carrying with him presents from Hindústán.

Eighth year of the Reign.

The beginning of this year corresponded with Wednesday, 18th Rajab, 970 H. (13 March, 1563 A.D.). A tragical event occurred in the course of this year.1 Adham Khán Kokaltásh, son of Máham Anka,2 could not endure to see the elevation of his compeers.3 In the presumption of youth, and pride of wealth and station, he yielded to the incentives of Shahabu-d dín Ahmad Khán, Mu'nim Khán Khán-khánán, and several other nobles, and murdered Khán-i 'azam [Shamsu-d dín Muhammad Atka]. then prime minister, as he was sitting in his public office. Then trusting to the favour and kindness which had been shown to him by the Emperor, he went and stood at the door of the harem. His Majesty rushed out of the harem, sword in hand, and the assassin was bound hand and foot, and cast over the parapet in punishment of his crime.4 This murder was committed on the morning of Sunday, 12th Ramazán, 970 H. All those who had taken part in the conspiracy fled, and hid themselves through fear of punishment. Mu'nim Khán and Muhammad Kásim Khán Mir-i bahr (commander of the boats) went over the Jumna, and destroyed the bridge by which they crossed. Shababu-d dín Ahmad Khán Naishapúrí concealed himself. 'His Majesty showed great solicitude for the sons of the deceased minister, and for Máham Anka; but the latter, in anger and in grief for her son, fell ill and died forty days afterwards.

² He was her younger son. His brother was Muhammad Bakí Khau. See Akbarnama, vol. ii. p. 218. Blochmann's Ain-i Akbari, vol. i. pp. 323 and 381.

Badáání places this assassination in 969 n. He says the unfortunate minister was cut to pieces (pára pára), and he adds that as a spark of life was left in the assassin after his fall, the Emperor ordered him to he thrown over the parapet again. He was huricd one day before his victim. Firishta's account agrees; hut the translation is inaccurate in two points. It calls the minister Shahabu-d din instead of Shamsu-d din, and makes Maham Anka father of the minister instead of mother of the assassin. See Extract from Akbar-náma, infra.

Next day (after the murder) Ashraf Klián Mir-munshi received orders to seek out and bring back to His Majesty Mu'nim Khán, Shahábu-d dín Ahmad Khán, and Kásim Khán. The thought of having participated in this plot weighed upon the mind of Mu'nim Khán, so although he held the title of Khánkhánán, and held the offices of minister (wakálat) and tutor (atálik), he having found an opportunity lest Agra by night, and went off along with Kásim Khán, commander of the boats, towards Kábul, where his son 'Abdu-l Ghaní Khán was then living. When they came to the pargana of Sarút, in the Doab, the jágir of Mír Mahmúd Munshi, one of the Munshi's officers, Kásim Alí Sístání, who was shikkdár of the district, having heard of their arrival as fugitives from the Court, went out with a party of the inhabitants, and made them prisoners. They were then sent to His Majesty, who winked at their offence, and reinstated them in their offices.

Conquest of the Gakhar country.

The country of the Gakhars lies upon the banks of the river Sind, well known as the Nil-áb. This territory, from the Siwálik hills to the borders of Kashmír, has been from all time the possession of the Gakhars, although other tribes, such as the Khari, Jánúba, Jatriya, Bhúkiyál, and Jat dwell in those parts in subordination to the Gakhars. From the beginning of the reign of the late Emperor Bábar to the present time, this tribe would not suffer any intermission of loyalty to the illustrious dynasty, but remained steadfast in their obedience and devotion. Sárang Sultán was especially noted for his fidelity and loyalty. When Sher Khán acquired the supreme power in Hindústán, he wanted to bring the Gakhars under his authority, and used strenuous exertions to effect his purpose, but made little progress, until he succeeded, after much trouble, in getting Sárang Sultán into his hands as a prisoner. He ordered Sárang Sultán to be flayed, and shut up his son Kamál Khán in the fort of Gwalior.

After the death of Sárang, his brother Adam became the chief of the clan. Ho also espoused the cause of the Imperial family, and opposed the Afgháns.

When Sher Khán died, and his son Salím Khán obtained the supreme authority, he also, in imitation of his father, plundered and laid wasto various portions of the Gakhar territory, and did his utmost to vex and injure them. On one occasion, when some prisoners were brought to Gwalior for punishment, he ordered them to be placed in a house with a quantity of gunpowder, and the house to be set on fire. Common report tells how all these eaptives were blown into the air, and how their bodies were blown to pieces. Kamál Khán, who was sitting in a corner of the house, was by God's morey saved. When Salím Khán heard of his preservation he sent for him, and having induced him to take an eath of fidelity, appointed him to act, in concert with the governor of the Panjáb, in the subjugation of the Gakhar territory.

Afterwards, when Hindústán again came under the rulo of the Imperial house, Kamál Khán followed the example of his predecessors, and paid his allegiance. He was treated with princely favour, and received a grant of the parganas of Hanswa, Fathpur, and Karra-Manikpur as a jágir. There he remained until Sher Khán, the son of Salím Khán, attacked 'Alí Kulí Khán, and endeavoured to get possession of these districts. Kamál Khán was then ordered to support 'Alí Kulí Khán, and he exhibited such courage and resolution that he was graciously told that whatever request he liked to make should be granted. Kamál Khán, in his love for his native land, begged that he might be restored to his paternal inheritance. A farmán was accordingly issued that of the territories formerly held by Sultan Sarang, and now in the possession of Adam Khán Gakhar, one half should be given to Kamál Khán, and the other half should remain in the possession of Adam Khán. Orders were accordingly issued to the amirs of the Panjáb, to Mír Muhammad Khán, known as Khán-i kalán, and to Kutbu-d dín Muhammad Khán, that if Adam Khán made any resistance to the arrangement, they were to take the whole of the territory from him, and give it to Kamál Khán.

When the amirs informed Adam Khán of the purport of the farmáns, he and his son and his army were dissatisfied, and paid no heed to the command. A royal army marched into the country of the Gakhars to subdue it, and Adam Khán and his son resisted. Some sharp fighting followed, but the Gakhars were defeated, and Adam Khán was made prisoner. His son, with the defeated army, fled into Kashmír, but after some time he also was taken prisoner.² All the Gakhar territory then came under the power of the Imperial officers, and they made it over to Kamál Khán. The amirs also placed Adam Khán and his son in charge of Kamál Khán, and departed to their own jágirs. Kamál Khan kept Adam Khán near him until he died.

Affairs of Mu'nim Beg (at Kábul).

When Mu'nim Khán left Kábul to visit the Court of the Emperor, Muhammad Khán Akhta-begi was left there as governor, but on Mu'nim Khán being informed of his ill-treatment of the people of Kábul, he removed him from office, and appointed his own son, Ghaní Khán, in his place. He also sent back his nephew Abú-l Fath Beg, son of his brother Fazáíl Beg, to assist Ghaní Khán in his government. After a time Máh Chochak Begam and the people of Kábul were greatly distressed by the proceedings of Ghaní Khán. Among other acts he kept in confinement Tolak Khán Kúlchín, one of the oldest servants of the dynasty, until the people interfered and set him at liberty.

² Both father and son were placed in the custody of Kamal Khan. The father was kept in confinement till his death; the son was put to death.—Akbar-nama, vol. ii. (The episode about the Gakhars seems to have been omitted from the printed edition of the Akbar-nama.)

^{3.&}quot; He was wanting in sense and suavity."—Akbar-ndma, vol. ii. p. 231.

Tolak Khán then went to the village of Mámá-khátún, which was his jágir, and there waited his opportunity. It happened that a caravan from Balkh came and halted in the village of Cháríkárán, and Ghaní Khán went forth in haste to meet it. Tolak Khán assembled a body of his servants and adherents, and making a rapid night march fell upon Ghaní Khán,¹ and made him prisoner. At length some persons intervened, and obtained the freedom of Ghaní Khán. They took from him a treaty and covenant that he would never again molest Tolak Khán, but before Ghaní Khán got back to Kábul, he broke his covenant, and marched against Tolak Khán with a strong force. Tolak Khán, however, was apprised of the movement, and fled to the Court of the Emperor. Ghaní Khán pursued him in vain for some distance, and then returned to Kábul.

Some little while afterwards Ghani Beg went out one day for a stroll in the melon gardens, and the opportunity was seized by [Máh Chochak Begam] the mother of Mirzá Muhammad Hakím,2 in concert with Sháh Walí Atka, Mirzá Fazáíl Beg and his son Abú-l Fath Beg, to enter the fort and close the gates against Ghaní Khán. On returning and finding the gates of the fortress closed, Ghaní Khán understood that the people had revolted against him. Unablo to do anything, he went off to the Imperial Court. The mother of the prince then took the direction of affairs into her own hands. She appointed Mirzá Fazáíl3 Beg, whom Mirzá Kámrán had blinded, to the office of minister (wakálat), and his son Abú-l Fath Beg was made his deputy. But when in the distribution of the jágirs and villages he (Abú-l Fath) reserved the hest for himself, and appropriated the worst to the prince and his attendants. Shah Wali Atka, 'Ali Muhammad Asp, and others, could not brook his unjust allotment. In communication with the mother of the prince, they determined to remove him. One night Abú-l Fath came to the door of his house in a state of intexication and went down. Míran Beg having seen this, despatched him with one blow upon the head with his sword. His father, Fazáil Beg, endeavoured to escape into the Hazára, but some of the adherents of the prince went in pursuit, and overtook and beheaded him. Sháh Walí Beg Atka, with the approval of the mother of the prince, assumed the management of affairs, and gave himself the title of 'Adil Sháh.

Whon the report of these occurrences reached the ears of the Emperor, he appointed Mu'nim Kháu governor of Kábul and guardian (atálik) of the young prince Mirzá Muhammad. He also appointed Muhammad Kulí Khán Birlás, Husain Khán brother of Shahábu-d dín Ahmad Khán, Timúr Beg Uzbek, and several other nobles to assist and support him. The mother of the young prince, who was then ten years of age, assembled all tho forces she could, and taking the prince with her, she went, with the intention of resisting by force of arms, to Jalálábád, known in old times by the name of Jusáí. There she awaited Mu'nim Khán, who quickly marched against her, and defeated and scattered her forces at the first attack. After this he returned to Court. The Begam returned to Kábul, and suspecting the designs of Shah 'Alí Atka against her, she caused him to be put to death, and Haidar Kásim Kohbar was named wakil of the mirsá in his stead.

Affairs of Mirzá Sharafu-d din Husain.

Mirzá Sharafu-d dín Husain was son of Khwája Mu'ínu-d dín, son of Khwája Jáwíd Mahmud, son of Khwája 'Abdu-lla, who was a distinguished man among the Khwájas, and was the son of Násiru-d dín 'Abdu-lla Ahrár.' When the Mirzá came to Court, he was promoted to the dignity of Amíru-l umará, and received the jágir of Nágor. There he was distinguished by his energetic labours. His father now returned from Mecca, and received a right rayal reception. After a while Mirzá Sharaf, by the will of fate, and without any apparent reason or cause, having had his mind perverted by designing men, fled towards Någar. 1 Hazmt Husain Kuli Beg, son of Wali Beg Zú-l kadar, a relation of the late Khán-khánán Bairám Khán, having on account of his services been admitted to the order of nobility, and dignified with the title of khan, now received a grant of the jägir of Mirza Sharafu-d din Husain. Some of the principal nobles, as Muhammad Súdik, Muhammad Kuli Tugh-báni, Muzassar Mughal and Mirak Bahadur, were directed to support Husain Kuli Beg, and the command was given for them to pursue and capture Mirzá Sharafu-d din. If he repented of his unrighteons deeds, they were to soothe him and bring him to Court; but if not, they were to use their best exertions to punish his misconduct. When intelligence of the approach of Husain Kuli Beg Khán reached Mirzá Sharafu-d dín, he left Tarkhán Diwana, a trusty adherent, in Ajmír, and went off towards Julor.2 The Imperial forces invested Ajmir, and after two or three days Tarkhan Diwana capitulated.3 The nobles then hastened in pursuit of Sharafu-d din towards Jálor.

It so happened that just as Sharasu-d din reached Julor, Shah Abú-l Ma'úlí was returning from Mecca to the Imperial Court, and having had a meeting with Sharasu-d din, they concocted together a rebellious scheme. Abú-l Ma'álí was to march against the people of Husain Kulí Khán, who were in Hájípúr, and having disposed of him was to push on to Kábul and bring Mirzá Muhammad Hakím to Hindústán. Sharasu-d dín on his side was to do all he could to promote a rebellion. Abú-l Ma'álí marched off, taking with him a party of Sharafu-d dín's men, and when he approached Hájípúr, he learned that Ahmad Beg and Sikandar Beg, relations of Husain Kulí Khán, had come out to step him. Thereupon he turned in the direction of Nárnaul, and upon reaching the fort of that place, he made Mír Kísú the shikkdar prisener, and seized all the money which he found in the treasury, and divided it among his followers.

After receiving intelligence of this, Husain Kulí Khán sent his brother Isma'il Kuli Khán along with Muhammad Sádik Khán in pursuit of Abú-l Ma'álí. Upon reaching Hájípúr, and learning that Abú-l Ma'álí had drawn off to Nárnaul, they took Ahmad Beg and Sikandar Beg with them, and went in pursuit of him. Twelve kos from Narnaul, the brother of Abú-l Ma'áli, who was named Khán-záda [Muhammad], and was also called Sháh Lándán, left his jágir, and was en the way to jein his brother, but he was intercepted and made prisoner. Abú-l · Ma'álí fled from Nárnaul and went towards the Panjáb. Ahmad Beg and Sikandar Beg were sent off with a detachment in hot haste after him. A body of the men under their command had formerly served under Mirzá Sharafu-d dín Husain, and these men had bound themselves by an oath to desert Ahmad Beg and Sikandar Beg whenever Abú-l Ma'álí should be attacked, and to go over to the latter. One of this party, Dána Kulí by name, slipped away and hastened to inform Abú-l Ma'álí of the conspiracy. Upon hearing it he placed himself in ambush in a jungle by the side of the road, and when the two Begs came up he fell upon them unawares. The conspirators then drew their swords, and advanced against their own commanders, and the other soldiers, seeing how matters stood, took to flight. Ahmad Beg and Sikandar were left quite alone. They fought most manfully, and killed several of their assailants, but were eventually slain.

Khán, Tátár Khán, Rúmí Khán, and others, to follow Abú-l Ma'álí, and he himself proceeded to Dehlí, the seat of Government (dáru-l mulk).1

A remarkable occurrence has now to be mentioned. When Sharafu-d dín Husain fled from Court to Nágor, he had a slave, by name Koka Fúlád, one of the slaves of his father, who at all times secretly did everything in his power to injure the Emperor. This wretched man came into the royal camp, and was constantly on the watch for an opportunity. When the Emperor returned from his hunting excursion, and passing through the bázár of Dehlí, came near to the College² of Máham Anka, this bloodthirsty fellow shot an arrow at His Majesty; but by the mercy of God, who watched over the Emperor's safety, it did not inflict a severe wound, but merely grazed the skin. The attendants of the Emperor instantly fell upon the traitor, and with strokes of sword and dagger they sent him to hell. The Emperor pulled out the arrow and rode on to the palace. The wound was cured in a few days, and on the 6th Jumáda-s sání he mounted his royal litter,3 and proceeded to Agra, where he arrived on the 15th of the same month, in the year 971 A.H., agreeing with the eighth year of the reign.

Ninth year of the Reign.

The beginning of this year was Wednesday, 29th Rajab, 971 (13th March, 1564). When Abú-l Ma'álí killed Ahmad Beg, and found that the royal army was coming up in pursuit of him, he was dismayed, and turning aside from the direct roads he fled towards Kábul. When he approached Kábul, he wrote a letter full of expressions of affection and devotion for the late Emperor, and sent it to Máh Chochak Begam (the Emperor's widow). She sent to invite him in, and received him with honour. She also gave him her daughter in marriage. Abú-I Ma'álí now pushed himself forward, and took the direction of the establishment of Prince Muhammad Hakím.

A party of malcontents, who were displeased with the treatment they had received from Máh Chochak Begam, such as Shúgún, son of Karrácha Khán, and Shádmán, and others, leagued with Abú-l Ma'álí, and persuaded him that matters would never go on well as long as the Begam lived. He fell in with their views, and slew the unfortunate woman with a dagger. Then he got into his hands the Prince Mirzá Muhammad Hakím, who was of tender age, and took the direction of the government. He seized npon Haidar Kásim Kohbar, who was the minister (wakil) of the Mirzá, and put him to death. He also imprisoned his brother Muhammad Kásim. Hereupon Tardí Muhammad Khán, Bákí Mnhammad Khán Kákshál, Husain Khán, and several other adherents of the late Begam, conspired against him to avenge her death. 'Abdí Sarmast informed Abú-l Ma'álí of this conspiracy, and he instantly armed a party of his supporters, and went forth to destroy them. The conspirators cut their way into the fort, and Abú-l Ma'álí pressed after them. Many on both sides were killed, but at length Abú-l Ma'álí succeeded in driving them out of the fort, and they fled in all directions.

Muhammad Kásim, who was in confinement, obtained his release, and went to Mirzá Sulaimán, in Badakhshán. He informed him of all that had passed at Kábul, and urged him to march against the city. Mirzá Muhammad Hakím also sent a person to Mirzá Sulaimán, calling upon him for assistance. The Mirzá, on hearing the state of affairs, assembled the forces of Badakhshán, and with the approval of Khurram Begam his wife, marched against Kábul. Abú-l Ma'álí, on his side, assembled the forces of Kábul, and taking with him Mirzá Muhammad Hakím, advanced to the river Ghorband. Both sides drew up their forces, and the battle began. The Kábul men on the right of Abú-l Ma'álí were defeated by the Badakhshán forces, and began to retreat. He hastened up with some reinforcements to support them, leaving Mirzá Muhammad Hakím in charge of his servants. These men seized the opportunity to cross the river and join Mirzá Sulaimán. When this was discovered by the Kábul forces, they were seized with panic, and every man fled to his home.

When Abú-l Ma'álí came back from his charge, he was dismayed to find no trace either of Mirzá Hakím or of his army, so he fled. The Badakhshán men pursued and overtook him at the village of Cháríkárán. He was brought to the presence of Mirzá Sulaimán, who, elated with his success, went on to Kábul, taking Mirzá Muhammad Hakím with him. Three days afterwards he sent Abú-l Ma'álí, with his haris bound behind his neck, to Mirzá Muhammad Hakím, and hay ordered him to be strangled in punishment of his crimes. The happened on the night of the 17th Ramazán, 270 m Sulaimán now sent to Badakhshán for his daughter, and her to Mirzá Muhammad Hakím. After stranged in his confidence, to the past of the past of the returned to Badakhshán.

victory and acquired so much treasure, returned, greatly elated, to Karra, and took possession of his government.

Journey of the Emperor to Narwar.

On the 12th Zi-l ka'da, 971 H., corresponding with the ninth year of the reign, the Emperor left Agra, and went towards the river Chambal with the object of elephant hunting.1 In consequence of the heavy rains and the inundations, he had to halt fifteen days, and when he did cross over one of his choice elephants named Lakhna was drowned. When he came to the vicinity of the town of Narwar he pitched his camp, for the jungle hard by was an elephant haunt. * * * After they had cleared that neighbourhood of elephants, he marched on towards Málwa, and halted at Rewar.2 Heavy rains compelled him to remain two days in sight of that town. From thence he procecded to Sárangpúr, and again the heavy rains and floods greatly distressed his escort. When he approached Sárangpúr, Muhammad Kásim Khán Naishapúrí the governor came forth to meet him and presented tribute. Next day the Emperor proceeded onwards towards Mandú.

'Abdu-lla Khán Uzbek was governor of Mandú, and as there were sundry differences between him and the Emperor, he was greatly alarmed at his approach, and consequently fled off towards Gujarát. When the Emperor was informed of his flight, he sent Mukím Khán, one of his chief nobles, to 'Abdu-lla, to advise and reassure him. Although Mukím Khán urged and persuaded, his words had no effect, for 'Abdu-lla thought that the object of the Khán was to detain him with words and stories till the royal forces had arrived and secured the roads. So he left Mukím Kháu and fled; and the Khán went back and reported his want of success.

The Emperor's anger was roused, and he gave orders for a force to be sent to arrest 'Abdu-lla's progress. The Emperor himself followed, and on reaching Mandú intelligence arrived that his advanced force was engaged in action with 'Abdu-lla, so he pressed on with all speed. When 'Abdu-lla saw that some of his most faithful followers had fallen, and heard that the Emperor was near at hand, he left his baggage and soldiers and hastened off. The Imperial forces pursued him as far as the country of Alí,¹ on the confines of Gujarát, and drove him away from his wives and elephants. He then went to Chángíz Khán in Gujarát. This Chángíz Khán was a slave of Sultán Mahmúd of Gujarát, after whose death he had obtained the government of the country. The royal forces which had captured the horses and elephants and wives of 'Abdu-lla then turned back to Alí, where they were received with honour.

The Imperial army then moved, and on the new moon of Zí-l hijja, 791 H., reached Mandú. The zamindárs of the neighbourhood came in to pay their allegiance, and met with a gracious reception. Mírán Mubárak Sháh, ruler of Khándesh, sent a letter and suitable presents by the hands of ambassadors to the Emperor. After some days the ambassadors received permission to return, and a farmán was sent to Mírán Mubárak Shah directing him to send any one of his daughters whom he thought worthy to attend upon the Emperor. Itimád Khán was also sent along with the ambassadors. When Mubárak Sháh received this gracious communication, he was greatly delighted, and he sent his daughter with a suitable retinue and paraphernalia to His Majesty, esteeming it a great favour to be allowed to do so. Whilst the Emperor remained at Mandú, Khán Kulí,2 a servant of 'Abdu-lla Khán, who was now in Hindia,3 and Mukarrab Khán, one of the nobles of the Dekhin, in compliance with the royal command, came in with their followers, and had an audience. Mukim Khan, who had exhibited vigour and ability in this expedition, received the title of Shujá' Khán.

In Muharram, 972 (August, 1564), the Imperial camp moved from Mandú, and was pitched in sight of the town of Nálcha.1 Karra Bahádur Khán was appointed governor of Mandú, and an order was made directing a party of the Imperial followers who remained behind in Mandú to stay in that province along with Karra Bahádur, and zealously serve His Majesty. Two days after, the camp moved towards Agra, and upon reaching Ujjain, it remained there four days, in consequence of heavy rain. In four days' march from thence it reached Sárangpúr, and in a week afterwards it arrived at the pargana of Kherár, within sight of the town. By regular stages it reached Sipri. Here the scouts brought in news of a herd of elephants, in which there was one very large animal.2 The royal servants went in chase of them, and captured the whole of them. Proceeding by way of Narwar and Gwalior, the Emperor reached Agra on the 3rd Rabi'u-l awwal. In the course of this year the Emperor had twins borne to him, one of whom was named Hasan, the other Husain; but they lived only a month.

After His Majesty returned from Mandû, and while he was enjoying himself at Agra, he often rode out to Kákrání, a village in the vicinity of the capital, which was remarkable for the purity of its air and the excellence of its water. He deemed this a suitable site for a palace, so he ordered one to be built. In a short time fine houses arose, and a great town sprung up, which was called Nagar-chín.

Account of Khwaja Mu'azzam.

Khwája Mu'azzam was maternal uncle of the Emperor. He was son of 'Alí Akbar, and a descendant of Shaiku-l Islám Ahmad Jám. This person had been guilty of several disgraceful actions during the reign of the Emperor Humáyún, who had felt constrained to speak about and censure his offences to his son and successor. His unseemly conduct at length compelled the Emperor to banish him, whereupon he went to Gujarát. From thence he proceeded to Mecca, and after staying there some time he returned to the Court of Humáyún. Upon the demise of the crown, Bairám Khán Khánkhánán became the ruling power in the State, and he, knowing the character of the Khwaja, procured an order for his exile. After his banishment, the Khwaja stayed for a while in Gujarát. but subsequently returned to the Court of the Emperor. Bairám Khan then countenanced him, and he received some degree of attention. Upon the disgrace of Bairam Khan, the Emperor took compassion on the Khwaja, and gave him some districts in jágir. But the Khwája's perverse and evil nature got the better of him, and he was guilty of some disgraceful deeds. To mention one-There was a woman named Fátima attached to the harem of the late Emperor, and the Khwaja had taken to himself a daughter of hers named Zuhra Agha. After some time he formed the design of putting her to death. Upon her mother being informed of this fact, she hastened to make it known to the Emperor, and to crave his protection. The Emperor was just about to start on a hunting excursion, and he assured the poor mother that he would take measures to rescue her daughter from the Khwaja. Accordingly he sent Táhir Muhammad Khán Mir-i farághat and Rustam Khán to give the Khwaja notice that the Emperor was about to visit him. When Tahir Muhammad reached his house, he was so enraged that he killed the poor woman. As soon as the Emperor arrived, and was informed of the Khwaja's cruel actions, which cried for punishment, he gave orders to his followers to well thrash him, and then to put him in a boat and souse him several times in the river. After this he sent him a prisoner to the fort of Gwalior, where he died in confinement.

Abú-I Fazl says the Emperor had him and his vile associates bound hand and foot and cast into the river. Although immersed several times, he would not drown, and whenever he came up he abused the Emperor. He died insane.—Akbar-náma, vol. ii. p. 276.

Mirzá Sulaiman's Third Visit to Kábul.

It has been before narrated how Mirzá Sulaimán came to the rescue of Mirzá Muhammad Hakím, and how, after overthrowing Sháh Abú-l Ma'áli, he gave jágirs to his own adherents, and then returned home. Mirzá Muhammad Hakím and his people, being greatly annoyed by these Badakhshánís, drove them out of Kábul. Mirzá Sulaimán then came again with a large army to tako revenge for this expulsion. Mirzá Muhammad Hakím left Bákí Kákshál in command of his followers at Kábul, and went off himself to Jalálábád and Parsháwar. Upon reaching the river Márán, Mirzá Sulaimán learnt how Mirzá Muhammad Hakím ...d abandoned Kábul, and gone to Jalálábád.

Mirzá Muhammad Hakím went on from Parsháwar to the shores of the Indus, and from thence forwarded to the Emperor a letter containing a statement of his grievances. Mirzá Sulaimán, on learning that Mirzá Muhammad Hakím had made an appeal to the Emperor, and had left Parsháwar, stationed one of his adherents named Kambar with three hundred men at Jalálábád, and went towards Kábul.

When the statement of Mirzá Muhammad Hakím reached the Imperial Court, an order was given directing all the nobles and jägirdårs of the Panjáb (such as Muhammad Kulí Khán Bírlás Khán-i Kalán, Kutbu-d dín Muhammad Khán, Kamál Khán Gakhar, and others) to assemble their forces and march to the assistance of Mirzá Muhammad Hakím. These nobles, in obedience to the command, proceeded to the Indus, and joined Muhammad Hakím. Then they began their march to recover Kábul. On reaching Jalálábád they sent Mirzá Kasán into the place to summon Kambar, Mirzá Sulaimán's representative, to surrender; but that doomed one would not submit, so the Imperial forces attacked the fort. They took it in an hour, and put Kambar and all his three hundred men to the sword. Two men were allowed to go and carry the intelligence to

Mirzá Sulaimán, and the head of Kambar, with the news of the eapture of the city, was sent to Bákí Kákshál at Kábul.

Mirzá Sulaimán, on hearing of the fall of Jalálábád; and tho approach of the royal forces, fled to Badakhshán. Mirzá Muhammad Hakím, escorted by the Imperial nobles, returned to Kabul, and again assumed the Government. The nobles, in obedience to the orders which they had received from the Emperor, then returned to their jágirs, excepting Khán-i Kalán, who had been appointed guardian of Mirzá Muliammad Hakím. Shortly afterwards the Mirzá, without consulting Khán-i Kalán, gave his sister, who had formerly been married to Shah Abú-l Ma'álí, to be the wife of Khwája Husain Nakshabandí, a dcscendant of Khwaja Bahau-d din. Presuming upon the importance he had acquired by this marriage, the Khwája began to interfere in the affairs of the Mirzá, and to call Khán-i Kalán to account. The Khán was a hot-tempered man, and would not endure this, so he left Kábul, and went to Lahore without taking leave. Then he made a report of what had occurred to the Emperor.

Tenth Year of the Reign.

The beginning of this year corresponded with Sunday, 9th Sha'bán, 972 H. (11 March, 1565 A.D.). At the beginning of this year His Majesty wished to go elephant hunting. Scouts were accordingly sent out to seek for the animals, and to report when they found them. On the 1st Rajab, 972, the Emperor himself started for Narwar and Garha by way of Dhúlpúr. Upon reaching Narwar, he pitched his camp. The scouts then reported that there were several herds of elephants in the neighbouring jungles. His Majesty speedily went to the jungle, and returned after capturing all the elephants. Another day the scouts brought news to the camp that there were many elephants in a desert about eight kos distant. The royal servants started off, and towards the close of the day they found the animals, every one of which they captured. They drove them towards the fort of Pánwa, where they arrived in the middle of the night. Three hundred and fifty elephants were taken that day. From thence they returned to the royal camp, which was in the vicinity of Garha. There it remained nearly twenty days. The hot season now came on, and the unhealthy winds blow, and many men in the camp became weak and ill, so His Majesty returned to Agra.

Building of the Port of Agra.

In this year the command was given for building a new fort of hewn stone at Agra, instead of the old citadel, which was of brick, and had become rainous. The foundation was accordingly laid, and in four years the fortress was completed. In those days it has no equal in the world. The walls are ten gar in thickness, and are built of stone and mortar. The stones are out on both sides, and are joined with the greatest alrety. The height of the fort is more than forty gaz. There is a most day all round, and faced on both sides with stone and mortar. It is twenty gaz wide and ten gaz deep, and water is conducted into it from the river Jumna. The cost of this building was manly three krors of tankas? The date of foundation of its pates is found in the words "bindi dar-i bihish!" (974 n.).

jágir of Sikandar Khán, the latter came out to meet him, and conducted him to his house with all due ceremony. He submitted to the Emperor's command, and acted as if he meant to go to Court. But after some days he said to Ashraf Khan, "Ibrahim Khan is a much greater man than I, and he is in this neighbourhood; the best thing we can de is to go to him, and get him to acquiesee in your demand. We will then go to Court together." Upon this understanding they went to tho town of Saráwar,1 which was the jágir of Ibráhim Khán.

When Sikandar Khán and Ibráhím Khán met, they took counsel together, and reselved to consult with 'Alí Kuli Khán, who was one of their own tribe, and was the Emperor's representative in their part of the country. In pursuance of this resolution, and with the concurrence of Ashraf Khan, they preceded to Jaunpur, the jägir of Khán-zamán. After consultation their judgmont was adverse to the course proposed, and they determined to rebel. They improperly detained Ashraf Khán, and then broko into open rebellion. Ibráhím Khán and Sikandar Khán went to Lucknow, full of hostilo designs. Khán-zamán and his brother went to Karra Mánikpúr, and there began their revolt.

Sháham Khán Jaláir, Sháh Bidágh Khán, Amir Khán, Muhammad Amín Díwána, Sultán Kulí Kháldár, with all the jägirdárs of his neighbeurhood, Sháh Táhir Badakhshí, the brother of Shah Khalilu-lla, and other nobles, being informed of these rebellious proceedings, marched out against the rebels, and fought against them. In the course of the fighting Muhammad Amin fell from his horse, and was made prisoner by the rebels. Sháham Khán and Bidágh Khán exerted themselves most strenuously, but as the forces of the rebels more than doubled their own, they were obliged to retreat and shut themselves up in the fort of Namíkhá,2 from whence they sent an account to the Emperer.

Khán-zamán and his brother Bahádur Khán now showed their dispositions, and began to plunder the country in their neighbourhood. Majnún Khán Kákshál,¹ the jágirdár of that quarter, shut himself up in the fort of Mánikpúr. He sent to inform Asaf Khán Khwája 'Abdu-l Majíd, governor of Garha, of the state of affairs, and summoned him to his side. Leaving a detachment in charge of the country of Garha, Asaf Khán proceeded with a strong force to Karra, which was his own jágir. There he divided, as a bounty among the soldiers, the treasures of Chanrágarh which had fallen into his hands. Ho also sent a large sum to Majnún Khán. Asaf Khán and Majnún Khán took a bold course, and went forth to confront the rebels, and sent a report to the Emperor of the position.

When the statements of the amirs reached the Emperor at his encampment, he resolved to punish these attempts. He ordered Mu'nim Khán Khán-khánán to march in advance with a strong force, and to cross over the river at Kanauj, to keep the enemy in check. He himself remained behind a few days to collect and organize his forces. In the month of Shawwál he crossed over the Jumna, and marched to chastise the rebels. Upon approaching Kanauj, Mu'nim Khán came forth to meet him, bringing with him Kiyá Khán Gang, who had joined the rebels, and begged forgiveness for him. The Emperor pardoned his crime, and restored him to his former position. He remained ten days waiting for an opportunity to cross the river.

When the waters subsided, intelligence was brought that Sikandar Khán, heedless of what was to happen, was still in Lucknow. Thereupon His Majesty left Khwája Jahán, Muzassar Khán, and Mn'in Khán in charge of the camp, while he himself started off at midnight with a valiant body of men to march against the rebel with all speed. That night and the next day he struggled through all obstacles without taking rest, and on the following morning came in sight of Sikandar at Lucknow. As soon as Sikandar heard of his approach, he hastily abandoned Lucknow and fled. The horses of the Emperor's force were quite wern out with fatigue, so Sikandar made his escape, and went off unmolested to Khán-zamán and Bahádur Khán. They also were new alarmed, and retreated from before Asaf Khán to Jaunpúr. They marched from thence, and sending forward their adherents, they crossed the river at the forry of Narhan, and halted on the other side of the river.

The Emperor sent on Yúsuf Muhammad Khán in advance from Lucknow, and himself followed close after him. He encamped in the neighbourhood of Jaunpur, and there Ksaf Khan and Majnún Khán came to pay their respects, and were graciously received. Asaf Khán brought with him some costly efferings, which were accepted. Next day his army, which had been got together by means of the treasures of Garha, and numbered five thousand horso, was drawn out in the plain and reviewed by His Majesty, who expressed his royal satisfaction. On Friday, the 12th Zi-l hijja, the royal forces entered the citadel of Jaunpúr. Orders were given to Asaf Khán and other great nebles to cross over the Ganges at the ferry of Narhan, where 'Alí Kulí Khán and his followers had passed, and then to go to confront the rebels, and act according to circumstances. Asaf Khan, in obedience to orders, crossed the Ganges with the force under his command.

Between 'Alí Kulí Khán-zamán and Sulaimán Kirání Afghán, ruler of Bengal, there was a streng alliance and identity of interest; it was therefore deemed expedient to send an envey to Sulaimán, in order to ferbid his rendering assistance to Khán-zamán. Hájí Muhammad Khán Sístání, a man remarkable for prudence, was accordingly sent. When he reached the fort of Rohtás, some Afghán chiefs, who were in league with 'Alí Kulí Khán, arrested him and sent him to 'Alí Kulí. The Hájí was on very friendly terms with the Khán, who was greatly pleased to see him, and did his utmost to treat him with respect and honour. The Khán thought it advisable to make the Hájí the medium of seeking forgiveness for his offences, and determined to send his mother along with the Hájí to make intercession at Court. The result of this proceeding will be hereafter narrated.

Orissa.

The Rája of Orissa, one of the divisions of the province of Bengal, was a powerful chief, and kept a strong hand over all the surrounding country. The Emperor sent Husain Khán Khazánchí and Mahápátar, who was an accomplished master of Hindí music, on an embassy to the Rája, holding out great promises of favour and distinction to induce him to prevent Sulaimán Khán Afghán from rendering any assistance to 'Alí Kulí Khán. After honourably entertaining Husain Khán and Mahápátar for four months, he sent them back to Court with several fine elephants and other splendid presents. This country of Orissa is an extensive territory, of which the capital is Jagannáth—Jagannáth being an idol which gives name and renown to the city.

Flight of A'saf Khán to Garha.

After Asaf Khán had joined the Emperor and shown his forces, Muzaffar Khán showed hostility towards him, and induced some persons to bring charges against him in respect of the plunder of Garha. He himself also alarmed Asaf Khán with some significant observations. This filled the heart of Asaf Khán with suspicion and anxiety. When he was made commander of the forces, and was sent against 'Alí Kulí Khán, he seized the opportunity, and at midnight went off with his brother Wazír Khán, and his party, towards Karra. Next day the chief nobles, without delay, communicated the fact of his flight to the Emperor, and the Emperor appointed Mu'nim Khán to succeed him in the command. He also sent Shujá'at Khán with a detachment in pursuit of Asaf Khán, to chastise him for his conduct. When Shujá'at Khán reached Mánikpúr, he found that Asaf Khán had gone to Karra, and intended to proceed from thence to Garha-Katanka.¹ Shujá'at Khán embarked his men in boats, intending to cross the river, and Asaf Khán, being informed of this, turned back to the river-bank, and reached it as the boats arrived. A great struggle ensued, in which Asaf Khán succeeded in preventing the landing of Shujá'at Khán, who was obliged to return to his own side at nightfall. In the course of the night, Asaf Khán resumed his flight, and next morning Shujá'at Khán crossed the river in pursuit; but finding the attempt to overtake him hopeless, he fell back and rejoined the Emperor at Jaunpúr.

Mission of Kalij Khán to the Fort of Rohtás.

This fort is situated in Bihár, and in height and strength excels all the fortresses of Hindústán. The surface of the hill upon which the fort is built is more than fourteen kos in length, and its width is three kos, and the height from the plain to the battlements is about half a kos.² From the time of Sher Khán Afghán it remained in the hands of the Afgháns, until the time when Sulaimán Kirání became ruler of Bengal. Fath Khán Tibatí then seized upon it, and refused to submit to Sulaimán. In the year 972 H., Sulaimán collected an army, and in the expectation of the help of 'Alí Kulí Khán marched against Rohtás, and laid siege to it.

When the Imperial forces marched in that direction against Khán-zamán, Fath Khán, seizing—then this favourable chance, sent his brother Husain Khán to the Emperor with rich presents, and with a message in which he said that the fort belonged to the Emperor, and that he would send him the keys as soon as the Imperial camp was pitched at Jaunpúr.

² Agriculture is carried on within the fortress, and water is so abundant that if a peg is driven into the ground, or a hole is dug for a fire, water is overywhere found.

—Baddunf, vol. ii. p. 78.

Sulaimán, on being informed of the approach of the Imperial forces, raised the siege. Fath Khán being thus relieved of his adversary, brought into the fort all the provisions he could collect. Repenting of having sent his brother on the mission, he now wrote to him directions to make his escape, and come into the fort, which was well stored. When the Emperor encamped at Jannpár, Husain Khán requested that some one might be sent with him to receive the keys of the fort. Kalíj Khán was accordingly sent to receive the keys from Fath Khán, and bring them to the Emperor. But when Kalíj Khán reached Rohtás, Fath Khán affected to comply, and detained him some days. Kalíj Khán at length discovered the duplicity of Fath Khán, and returned to Court unsuccessful.

Proceedings of 'Ali Kuli Khán (Khán-zamán). 🗸

When 'Ali Kuli Khán faced the Imperial forces at the ferry of Narhan, he sent his brother Bahádur Khán, in company with Sikandar Khán, to the country of Sarwár, in order to stir up a rebellion in that country. When this news reached His Majesty's ears, he issued orders for several of the chief nobles, such as Sháh Bidágh Khán and his son 'Abdu-l Matlab Khán Kiyá Khán and * * * to march against Sikandar and Bahádur Khán, under the command of Mír Mu'izn-l Mulk, who was a descendant of the Saiyids of Meshhed, and was renowned for his valour.²

It has been already mentioned that Khán-khánán (Mn'nim Khán) was sent to take the place of Asaf Khán in command of the army, which confronted Khán-zamán at the ferry of Narhan. Between Khán-khánán and Khán-zamán there was an old and warm friendship, and when they were thus opposed to each other, a correspondence was opened, and it was agreed that Khán-zamán should wait upon Khán-khánán to discuss the terms of peace. The negociations lingered on for four or five months, and warlike operations were suspended.

The Emperor then sent Khwaja-jahan and Darbar Khan to the army, to ascertain and report if this eessation of hostilities were advisable, and if not to order an immediate advance of the Imperial forces over the river against the rebels. When Khwajajahán and Darbár Khán reached the army, Khán-zamán resolved to profit by their arrival, and having offered his congratulations he brought forward his proposals of peace. After many communications and much correspondence, it was agreed that Khánzamán and Ibráhím Khán on one side, and Khwája Jahán and Darbar Khan on the other side, should have an interview in beats in the middle of the river.1 After a long discussion it was determined that Khán-zamán should send his mother, 'Alí Khán, and Ibráliím Khán his uncle, to the Court of the Emperor, to ask pardon for his offenees. Upon receiving forgiveness the Khán and his brother and Sikandar Khan were to go to Court. Khanzamán was also to send with his mother some elephants which he possessed. These matters being agreed upon, Khán-zamán returned to his camp. Khán-khánán and Khwája-jahán wrote a statement of the settlement, and sent it by Darbar Khan to the Emperor. Next day 'Alí Kulí Khán sent his mother, and Ibráhím Khán, and the elephants in charge of Mír Hádí his Sadr, and Nizam Aka, one of his confidants. Khan-khanan and Khwaja-jahan took them and the elephants, and proceeded to Court to ask forgiveness for Khán-zamán.

Just at this time accounts arrived of the operations which Mir Mu'izn-l Mulk and the other nobles were carrying on against Bahádur Khán and Sikandar, whom Khán-zamán had sent to ercate disturbances and make a diversion in the sarkár of Sarwar. When intelligence of the approach of the royal forces reached them, they halted where they were, and sent persons to Mir Mu'izn-l Mulk to assure him that they had no wish to contend against him, and entreated him to be the mediator to obtain their forgiveness from the Emperor. They promised to send the elephant which they had as an offering, and to return to their duty upon pardon being vouchsafed to them. Mu'izn-l Mulk sent to say that their offences could be purified only by the sword. Bahádur Khán again sent a person to Mu'izn-l Mulk to propose that he should wait upon him, and discuss the matter. Mu'izu-l Mulk agreed to this, and went to the border of his camp, whither Bahádur Khán came to meet him, and to make his propositions of peace. But Mu'izu-l Mulk would hear of nothing but war, so Bahádur Khán returned disappointed, and resolved to make ready for battle.

Abú-l Fazl condemns Khán-khánán's simplicity, says that it was he who met Khán-zamán on the river and settled the terms of peace, and that at his recommendation the Emperor sent Khwája-jahán to reassure Khán-zumán.—Akhar-ndma, vol. ii. p. 326. But Badáání states (vol. ii. p. 79) that Khán-khánán and Khwája-jahán went tegether to the meeting, attended by three or four others.

Lashkar Khán Mir Bakhshi and Rújú Todar Mal¹ now arrived with reinforcements for the royal army, and Bahádur Khán and Sikandar Khán renewed their proposals of peace, and asked for a delay until it was ascertained what answer was given by the Emperor to the mother of Khán-jahán and to Ibráhím Khán, who had been sent to sue for forgiveness. But Mu'izn-l Mulk was so eager for war that he would not listen to their words, and so brought upon himself defeat.

Mu'izu-l Mulk drew out his forces for battle, and sent on his

The young man entered life as a writer, but he soon rose from that humble position, and was employed by Sher Shah in superintending the crection of New Rohtas (supra, p. 114). It was under the able government of Sher Shah that his natural talents were trained and developed, so that he was afterwards of inestimable service to Akbar, and made a name which still remains famous. This is the first time the Tabakat mentions him, but henceforward he is one of the most prominent and active of all the able subordinates of Akbar. He died on the 11th day of the year 993 (10 Nov. 1589).

advanced guard under Muhammad Amín Díwána, Salím Khán, 'Abdu-l Matlab Khán, Beg Múrín Khán, and other veteran soldiers; he himself took post with the main body. On the other side Sikandar had command of the advance, and Bahádur of the centre. In this order they advanced, and a warm action ensued. The royal forces defeated the advanced division under the command of Sikandar. Muhammad Yár, his son-in-law, was killed, and he himself fell back to the Black River, which was in his rear. Many of his soldiers were drowned in the river, and many others died by the sword. The victorious forces then broke up in search of plunder. Mu'izu-l Mulk, with a few men, kept his position, and Bahádur until now did not stir from his post. But now he seized the favourable moment, attacked Mu'izu-l Mulk, and drove him from his position. Muhammad Bákí Khán and other of the amirs, under pretence of securing the baggage, and some others, treacherously withdrew themselves and stamped themselves with disloyalty. Shah Bidagh Khan, observing the condition of affairs, hastened forward, and in the heat of the fight was unhorsed. His son 'Abdu-l Matlab Khán rushed forward to rescue his father; but just at that juncture a party of the enemy made a charge and took Bidágh Khán prisoner, and it was only by dint of great exertion that 'Abdu-I Matlab made his escape. Mír Mu'izu-l Mulk was compelled to turn his back and flee. Rájá Todar Mal and Lashkar Khán, who were in reserve, struggled valiantly till night, and maintained their position; but as the centre had been driven away, their efforts were fruitless.

Next day all the defeated forces assembled in one place, and made for Kanauj, after sending a report of the engagement to His Majesty.

It has already been related how Khán-khánán conducted the mother of Khán-zamán and Ibráhím Khán, with Mír Hádí Sadr and Nizám Áká, to the Court of the Emperor. Ibráhím Khán, with uncovered head and with a sword and shroud upon his neck, stepped forward, and Khán-khánán entreated forgiveness. He urged that the services of Khán-zamán and his brother to the Imperial throne were manifest to all men, and the services they had rendered were invaluable. By the influence of their destiny they had now been guilty of an offence; but he trusted that the boundless mercy and kindness of His Majesty would look with an eye of tenderness upon the faults of such useful servants.

When this old servant thus besought forgiveness for past offences with a face full of hope, the Emperor, out of the kindness that he felt for Khán-khánán, said, "For your sake, I forgive their offences, but I am not satisfied that they will remain faithful." Khán-khánán then inquired what the order was as regarded their jágírs, and His Majesty replied, "As I have pardoned their offences, what question can there be about their jágirs? But so long as I remain in this neighbourhood they must not come over the river. When I return to the capital, they must send their valils there, and farmáns for their jágirs shall then be issued, under which they may take possession." Khán-khánán cast a look of joy to heaven, and sent the good news of the pardon to the mother of Khán-zamán. command of the Emperor, the sword and shroud were taken off the neck of Ihráhím Kháu. Khán-zamán's mother immediately sent messengers to Sikandar and Bahádur Khán, to carry the glad tidings of the pardon, and to inspire them with hope. also advised them to send directly to Court the elephants which they possessed. Sikandar and Bahádur were greatly delighted at this information, and sent the elephants called Koh-pára and Saf-shikan, along with other gifts, to His Majesty.

At the same time the report arrived from Rájá Todar Mal and Lashkar Khán upon the action which had been fought, and upon the misconduct of some of the amirs, as above related. His Majesty had pardoned the offences (of Sikandar and Bahádur Khán), so he said "their faults have been forgiven;" and to carry out his decision he sent orders to his amirs to return to be built; and the nobles also were to build houses and palaces. suitable to their rank. For it was determined that so long as 'Ali Kuli Khán and his brother should remain in the world, Janupur should be the capital of the State. The royal forces were sent in pursuit of the fugitives, with instructions to take no rest until they had inflicted the punishment due to them. When 'Ali Kuli Khán heard of this, he left the Siwálik hills, whither he had fled, and came to the side of the Ganges. lie sent a faithful follower named Mirzá Mubárak Rizwí1 to Court with a message. This man went along with the mother of Khán-zamán to Khán-khánán, and delivered his message. Khán-khánán, with the assistance of Mír 'Abdu-l Latif, Mullá 'Abdn-lla Makhdúmu-l Mulk, who was Shaikhu-l Islam of Hind, and Shaikh 'Abdu-n Nabi the Sadr, again made intercession for Khán-zamán; and the Emperor, in his great kindness, once more pardoned his offences.

Khwaja-jahan, Mir Murtaza Sharifi, and Makhdumu-l Mulk were commanded to go to Khan-zaman, to reprove him, and to convey to him the glad tidings of his forgiveness. When the party reached the camp of Khan-zaman, he came forth to meet them, and conducted them with great honour to his dwelling. He detained them some time, and treated them most respectfully. Then as required, he expressed contrition for his faults, took an eath of fidelity, and bade his visitors farewell. The Emperor's opponents having repented of their unrighteens deeds, and made their submission, he returned to the capital in the beginning of the eleventh year of the reign, corresponding with 976 H.

Elerenth year of the Reign.

The beginning of this year corresponded with Monday, 20th Sha'ban, 973 n. (12th March, 1566). The Court reached the capital Agra at the beginning of this year, on Friday, the 8th March of Mahdi Kásim Khán to Garha, and Flight of A'saf Khán to Khán-zamán.

The Emperor's mind being now relieved from all anxiety in respect of 'Alí Kulí Khán and other rebels, Mahdí Kásim Khán, one of the old nobles of the Imperial house, was sent with 3000 or 4000 men to Garha to settle the affairs of that country, and to capture Asaf Khán. Before Mahdí Kásim Khán arrived, Asaf Khán quitted the fort of Chaurágarh, and went off into the jungles. He wrote a letter, full of humility and repentance, to the Emperor, asking permission to go on the pilgrimage. Mahdí Kásim Khán, on arriving in Garha, secured all the country, and went in pursuit of Asaf Khán, who then wrote letters to Khán-zamán, proposing to go and join him. Khán-zamán wrote in reply, inviting him to come to him. Asaf Khán, deceived by this, went to Jaunpur, along with his brother Wazir Khán; but at the very first audience he beheld the arrogance of Khán-zamán, and was sorry that he had come. Mahdí Kásim Khán, being in despair of capturing the fugitive, returned to Garha, and he sent back to Court the men who had been despatched to reinforce him.

Khán-zamán sent Asaf Khán along with Bahádur Khán to seize upon some territories which were in the hands of the Afgháns; but he kept Wazír Khán near himself, and appointed men to watch him. Wazír Khán sent a person to Asaf Khán to say, "I intend to fly from this place at such and such a time: do you also in some way or other get away from Bahádur Khán." Asaf Khán accordingly, leaving all his baggage and property behind, went off in the night, and took the road to Karra-Mánikpúr. In the course of the night he travelled thirty kos, but Bahádur Khán pursued him, and overtook him between Jaunpur and Manikpur. A fight ensued, in which Asaf Khán was defeated and taken prisoner. Bahádur Khán threw him into a howda on an elephant, and went on his way, when Wazir Khán, who had got away from Khán-zamán, came up. Bahádur Khán, feeling that he was unable to cope with Wazir Khán, gave orders for putting Asaf Khán to death at once in the howda. Sword-cuts were aimed at Asaf Khán, three of his fingers were cut off, and he received a wound also in the nose; but Wazír Khán fought his way through, and rescued his brother. The two brothers then went to Karra, and Bahádur Khán returned without accomplishing his object. Wazír Khán proceeded to Court, and, through the intervention of Muzaffar Khán, he was admitted to an audience, and received pardon for his own and his brother's offences, while His Majesty was near Lahore, engaged in the pursuit of Mirzá Muhammad Hakim and in hunting, as will be related in their appropriate place. A farmán of favour and conciliation was sent to Asaf Khán.

Mirzá Sulaimán's fourth attempt upon Kábul.

It has been related in a former page how Mirzá Sulaimán led his army against Kábul, and how the Imperial forces were sent to the assistance of Mirzá Muhammad Hakím. Mirzá Sulaimán, unable to resist, retreated to Badakhshán, and the Imperial nobles, having taken leave of Mirzá Muhammad Hakím, returned to Hindústán. Sulaimán being now informed of the return of the Emperor's forces, assembled his army in Badakhshán, and marched with his wife Khurram Begam to effect the conquest of Kábul. Mirzá Muhammad Hakím left Kábul in charge of Ma'súm Koka, who was in his confidence, and had a reputation for courage. He himself went with Khwája Hasan Nakshabandí and the army into the valley of the Ghorband. Mirzá Sulaimán advanced to Kábul, and invested the fortress. When he found that he was not likely to capture it, he took counsel, and sent his wife Khurram Begam into Ghorband to Mirzá Muhammad Hakím, in order to delude him with a show of kindness and friendship, and to prevail over him by plausible representations. Khurram Begam accordingly left Mirzá Sulaimán before Kábul, and went towards Ghorband. She sent forward some persons to assure Mirzá Muhammad Hakím of her great affection for him, that having no son of her own, she looked upon him as her son, and that the great object of her journey was to bring about concord and unity.

Mirzá Muhammad Hakím, in consequence of this message, determined to have a meeting with Khurram Begam at Karábágh, which is about ten kos from Kábul; and he sent messengers to her to inform her of his intention, and to receive from her satisfactory assurances. Khurram Begam showed great joy at the prospect of a meeting, and affirmed with strong oaths that she had no deceitful or treacherous designs, and that her sole object was unanimity. The messengers listened to these words and returned. They had not gone far, when that stupid woman sent off messengers in hot haste to Mirzá Sulaimán, informing him of the intended meeting at Karábágh, and advising him to come there secretly with all speed, and await his opportunity. Mirzá Sulaimán left Muhammad Kulí Shaghálí, a man of courage and one of his confidential nobles, with 1000 men, in charge of his daughters, who were with him in his camp at Kábul. With the rest of the army he made a forced march to the neighbourhood of Karábágh, and there took post in ambush.

The messengers sent by Mirzá Muhammad Hakím to Khurram Begam returned to him, and reported all her assurances and pledges. They strongly urged him to meet her, and Khwája Hasan Nakshabandí exerted his influence to the same end. But Bákí Kákshál was opposed to the Mirzá's going, and said the woman was intent upon some stratagem and deception. Mirzá Muhammad Hakím, however, having promised to meet Khurram Begam, would not listen to Bákí Kákshál's objections, and proceeded with a few trusty followers towards Karábágh. When they reached the appointed place, some of Mirzá Sulaimán's soldiers, who had got separated in the night, came in and made known the fact of Mirzá Sulaimán having come, and of his lying in concealment. As soon as he was informed of this, Mirzá Muhammad Hakím returned, and Sulaimán, being informed of his departure, set off in pursuit. In the pass of Sanjad-darra they overtook some of Mirzá Muhammad Hakím's men, and made them prisoners. They also plundered the Mirzá's baggage, etc., which was in the rear, and they stopped in the pass. The Mirzá himself, along with Muhammad Hakím, reached Ghorband. From thence they went to Jalálábád, and afterwards to the banks of the Indus.

As soon as he crossed the river, the Mirzá wrote a letter to the Emperor, and sent it by his envoys. They reached the Court at the time it was at Nagar-chín, and were honoured with an interview. They presented the Mirzá's letter, in which he set forth the unfortunate state of his affairs. Intelligence of the distractions at Kábul had reached the Court before their arrival, and the Emperor had appointed Farídún Khán, maternal nucle of the Mirzá, and a noble of the Imperial Court, to go to his assistance. He now sent Khush-khabr Khán, one of the royal heralds, with money, goods of Hindústán, and a horse and saddle, to the Mirzá; and he wrote a farmán, in which he said that if the Mirzá required assistance, he would send the amirs of the Panjáb to support him.

When Khush-khabr Khán approached the camp, the Mirzá hastened out with due ceremony and respect to receive the furmán. After the arrival of Khush-khabr Khán, Faridún laboured to instigate the Mirzá to hostile attempts, representing that it would be easy for him to effect the conquest of Lahore. Hostilities having been resolved upon, he tried to persuade the Mirzá to seize Khush-khabr Khán. But although the Mirzá had been led away by his foolish persuasions, he was too honourable to consent to the detention of Khush-khabr Khán; so he invited the Khán to his presence secretly, and sent him away. Sultán 'Alí, a clerk who had fled from the Court, and Hasan Khán, brother of Shahábu-d dín Ahmad Khán, who was in Kábul, helped to excite the hostile spirit, and added their voices to Farídún's.

Won over by their persuasions, the Mirzá broke into open revolt, and marched against Lahore. Upon coming into the neighbourhood of the city, he began to plunder. Some of the nobles of the Panjáb, such as Mír Muhammad Khán-i Kalán,¹ Kutbu-d dín Muhammad Khán, and Sharíf Muhammad, hearing of these proceedings, assembled in Lahore. They looked to the safety of the fort, and wrote an account of the Mirzá's rebellion and hostile acts to the Emperor. On arriving near Lahore, the Mirzá encamped in the garden of Mahdí Kásim Khán, which is in sight of the city. Several times he marshalled his forces, and advanced to the foot of the fortifications; but the amirs of the Panjáb repulsed him with the fire of their guns and muskets. At length, when intelligence came of the advance of the royal forces, the Mirzá, feeling unable to offer resistance, took to flight.

March of the Army to Lahore.

When the hostile proceedings of Mirzá Muhammad Hakím became known to the Emperor, his countenance showed the anger which he felt, and he gave orders for the preparation of the army. Leaving Mu'nim Khán Khán-khánán in charge of A'gra, the capital, and Muzaffar Khán in direction of the diwâni, on the 3rd Jumáda-l awwal, 974 H., he began his march. In ten days he reached Dehlí, and went to visit the shrines of the saints who there repose, and bestowed his royal bounty on the poor and needy. From thence he proceeded by regular marches to Sirhind. He was greatly pleased with the bázárs of this town, and commended Háfiz Rakhna, who was the shikkdár, and placed the sarkárdári of that place in his charge. After crossing the Jumna, he received intelligence of the flight of Mirzá Muhammad Hakím, but he went on joyfully to Lahore. Upon approaching the city, the great amirs, who had exhibited their loyalty and devotion, came forth to meet him, and received distinguished marks of royal favour. In the month of Rajab he arrived at Lahore, the dáru-s saltanat, and took up his abode in the house of Mahdí Kásim Khán, in the citadel. By command of His Majesty, Kutbu-d dín Muhammad Khán and Kamál Khán Gakhar went in pursuit of Mirzá Muhammad Hakím, and advanced beyond the pargana of Bahra. There they learnt that the Mirzá had crossed the Indus, so they returned.

When Mirzá Muhammad Hakim heard that Mirzá Sulaimán had gono back to Badakhshán, ho made haste to Kábul. It has been related in a former page how Mirzá Sulaimán lest his daughters in his camp at Kábul, and went off in haste to seize upon Mirzá Muhammad Hakím at Karábágh. Muhammad Ma'súm Koka, whom Mirzá Muhammad Hakím had left in command at Kábul, sent out a force to attack the besiegers' camp, and defcated them. Muhammad Kulí Shagháli, who was in command, gave up his baggage to plunder, and went off with the daughters of Mirzá Sulaimán to Chahár-díwár Bágh, a place in the vicinity, and there entrenched himself. The Kabul forces surrounded the place, and sought to make him and Mirzá Sulaimán's daughters their prisoners; but Ma'súm Koka, considering it unseemly to make prisoners of the ladies, recalled his men. Mirzá Sulaimán returned unsuccessful from Karábágh, and again laid siege to Kábul, but Ma'súm Koka had grown bold and daring. Every day he sent out parties of men, and sorely troubled the besiegers. The weather grew very cold, so Mirzá Sulaimán became desirous of peace. Ma'súm Koka was aware of his distress, and was anxious to fight, so he would not make peace. . Finally, Mirzá Sulaimán sent in Kází Khán Badakhshí, who had been tutor of Ma'súm Koka, and prevailed upon him to send the Mirzá a small present. Peace no thus made. The Mirra first sent on his wife, and then followed her to Badakhshan.

When the Imperial Court arrived at Lucknow, many of the zamin lars of the country came in to pay their allegiance, and were gracionaly received. Those who were numble to come themselves sent their representatives with presents and offerings, and their assurances of loyalty. Among them, Muhammad Büki Tarkhan, son of Mirzá Tsá, ruler of Sindh, sent his ambassadors to Court, to say that his father, who had been one of the dependents of the Imperial throne, was dead, and that he, the successor, considered himself among the vassals of the Emperor. Sultan Mahmud, the governor (mali) of the fort, supported by the Kazilbáshís of Kandahár, was making attacks upon his territories, and he therefore besought the Emperor to prevent these molestations. In compliance with this application, the Emperor sent a farman to Sultan Mahmud, directing him to keep within his own boundaries, and not to attack the territories of Muhammad Bákí.

During the stay at Lahore, a letter arrived from Agra, from Mu'nim Khán Khán-khánán, with the intelligence that the sons of Muhammad Sultán Mirzá and Ulúgh Mirzá, by namo Ibráhim Husain Mirzá, Muhammad Husain Mirzá, and Sháh Mirzá, who held jugirs in the sarkar of Sambal, had broken out in rebellion. And when he, Khan-khanan, had marched as far as Dehlí to punish them, they had heard of his approach, and had gone off towards Mandú. This Muhammad Saltan Mirza was son of Wis Mirzá, son of Mankará Mirzá, son of Mausúr, son of Mankará, son of 'Umar Shaikh, son of Amír Timúr Gúrgún Sahib-kirán. His mother was a daughter of Sultán Husain Mirzá. After the death of Sultán Husain Mirzá, he came to the Court of the Emperor Bábar, and was honourably received. The Emperor Humáyún also treated him with consideration during the days of his reign. His sons, Ulugh Mirza and Shah Mirzá, were also in the service of Humáyún. These men had several times been guilty of rebellious actions, and their offences had been forgiven. Uligh Beg was killed in an attack upon the Hazára country, and Sháh Mirzá was killed by the arrows of robbers in the pass of Ma'múra, about ten parasangs from Kábul. Ulúgh Beg left two sons, Sultán Muhammad Mirzá and Sikandar Mirzá. His Majesty [Humáyún] treated them kindly, and to Sikandar Mirzá lıc gave the title of Ulúgh Mirzá, and to Sultán Muhammad Mirzá the title of Sháh Mirzá. When the Emperor Akbar succeeded to the throne, Muhammad Sultán Mirzá had grown old, so he was excused service, and the pargana of 'Azampur, in Sambal, was settled upon him for his maintenance. Several sons were borne to him in his old age-Ibráhím Husain Mirzá, Muhammad Husain Mirzá, and 'Akil Husain Mirzá. To every one of these the Emperor gave suitable jagirs, and advanced them to the dignity of amirs. They were constantly in attendance upon His Majesty, rendering their services. When the Emperor returned from his Jaunpur campaign, they repaired to their jugirs, and remained in Sambal. But when His Majesty went to Lahore, to repress the attempt of Mirzá Muhammad Hakím, Ulúgh Mirzá and Sháh Mirzá, in concert with their uncles Ibráhími Husain and Mirzá Muhammad Husain, broke out into rebellion, and attacked several parganas. But the jágirdárs of the neighbourhood gathered together and attacked them, so that they had to fly to Málwa, as will be related in the sequel.

Twelfth year of the Reign.

The beginning of this year corresponded with Monday, 2nd Ramazán, 974 H. (12th Feb. 1567). At the beginning of this year, which was near the Nauros, His Majesty determined to go out for a *Kamurgha*¹ hunt. An order was issued to all the great amirs for forty miles round Lahore to drive the animals together into a large plain, situated about five kos from Lahore.

Accordingly the amirs, under the direction of Mir Muhammad Atka, drove together about fifteen thousand animals, deer, nilgaos, jackals, foxes, etc., into that plain. The extent of this hunting ground was five kos on every side, and the Emperor's tent (kasar), which he used in his campaigns, was brought here and set up. The Emperor then mounted, and went out to hunt. The amirs and the khans daily drew their lines closer, and narrowed the circle. When several days had passed in this sport, His Majesty graciously gave his attendants permission to shoot, and afterwards made the permission general, so that there was no soldier or any person who did not get several kinds of game. After the sport was over, the Emperor returned towards the city, and on reaching the river of Lahore, he plunged into the water on horseback and swam over. Of the attendants who followed His Majesty, Khush-khabr Khún Yasawal and Mír Muhammad, son of Sher Muhammad Kúrdár, were drowned. While the lunt was going on, Hamid Bakri, one of the most favoured equerries (yasawal), having drunk too much, had wounded one of the Emperor's attendants with an arrow. person found an opportunity in the course of the lumning to complain to the Emperor, who ordered Kalij Khún to strike off the offender's head. Kalij Khan used a sword, which broke with the blow, without doing the culprit any harm. When the Emperor saw this, he respited him, but had him exposed to public derision.

About this time Muzassar Khán, who had been left in charge of the divani at Agra, proceeded to the camp of the Emperor, along with Wazir Khán, brother of Asaf Khán, and joined it while he was out on the hunting excursion. The author's father, who had remained behind at Agra on government business, accompanied Muzassar Khán on this journey, and I, the author of this work, went along with my father. In fine, the Emperor forgave the offences of Asaf Khán and Wazir Khán, and admitted the latter to an andience. A command was given that Asaf Khán, along with Majnún Khán Kákshál, should go to Karra-Manikpur, and provide for the safety of the dependent territories.

Intelligence new arrived that 'Alí Kuli Khán, Bahádur Khán, and Sikandar Khán had again broken their engagements, and risen in rebellion.\(^1\) Herenpeu the Emperor placed their cakil Mirzá Mírak Rizwí in custody of Khán Bákí Khán, and leaving the direction of the affairs of the Panjáb in the charge of Mír Muhammad Khán and all the Atkas, on the 12th Ramazán, 974 II. (22nd March, 1567), he started on his return to Agra.

When the Emperor arrived at Thánesar, there was an assomblage of Jogis and Sannyasis on the banks of a lake called Kur-This is a sacred place of the brahmans, and on occasion of eclipses the people of Hindústán flock thither from all parts to bathe. There was a great assemblage there on this occasion, and the people were bestowing their gifts of gold and silver, and jewels and stuffs, upon the brahmans. Many of them throw themselves into the water, and the Jogis and Sannyasis2 were gathering a rich harvest from their charity. In consequence of a fend which existed between these two seets, they came to the Emperor, seeking permission to settle it by fighting. Sanuyasis were between two and three hundred in number, and the Jogis, who wear only rags, were over five hundred. the adversaries stood ready to begin the fray, by the Emperor's order, some soldiers smeared their persons with ashes, and wont to support the Sannyasis, who were the weaker party. A floree fight ensued, and many were killed. The Emporer greatly enjoyed the sight. At length the Jogis were defeated, and the Sannyasis were the victors.

When the Imperial camp reached Dehlí, Mirzá Mírak Rizwí, who had been left in the charge of Khán Bákí Khán, made his escape, and although the Khán pursued him, he did not succeed in recapturing him, and so, being apprehensive of the Emperor's olispleasure, he himself fled. Tátár Khán, the governor of Dehlí, reported that Muhammad Amín Díwána,¹ who had fled from Lahore, had gone to the house of Shaháb Khán Turkomán, where he stayed some days, and after obtaining from him pecuniary assistance and a horse, had gone off to join the insurgents. This greatly incensed the Emperor, and he directed Sháh Fakhru-d dín Meshhedí to apprehend Shaháb Khan. When the Emperor was encamped at the village of Palwal,² Shaháb Khán was brought in for punishment, and was there executed.

Upon arriving at Agra, the Emperor was informed that Khánzamán was besieging the fort of Shergarh, four kos distant from Kanauj, in which fort Mirzá Yúsuf Khán was shut up. Nineteen days after his arrival at Agra, the Emperor left Khán-khánán in charge of the city, and on Monday, the 23rd Shawwal, 974 H., marched towards Jaunpúr. When he reached the pargana of Saket, 'Alí Kulí Khán decamped from before Shergarh, and fled to his brother Bahádur Khán, who was in Mánikpúr. The royal camp was next pitched near the town of Bhojpúr, and the Emperor detached Muhammad Kulí Khán Bírlás, Muzaffar Khán, Rájá Todar Mal, Sháh Bidágh Khán and his son 'Abdu-l Matlab Hasan Khán, 'Adil Muhammad, Khwája Ghiyásu-d dín 'Alí Bakhshá, and other officers, with nearly 6000 horse, against Sikandar, who was in Oudh. He himself continued his march towards Mánikpúr.

When he reached the pargana of Rái Bareilly, he learnt that 'Ali Kuli Khán and Bahádur Khán had crossed the Ganges with the object of proceeding towards Kálpí. He then directed his camp to proceed under the command of Khwája Jahán to the fort of Karra, and then marched with all possible speed to the ferry of Mánikpúr.¹ There he crossed the river upon the back of an elephant, and from 1000 to 1500 men swam the river along with him. Majnún Khán and Asaf Khán, who were in advance, constantly sent back intelligence of the enemy. It so happened that 'Alí Kulí Khán and Bahádur Khán had occupied themselves all that night in wine-drinking and licentiousness, and were heedless of everything else. The warlike demonstrations against them they attributed to the daring of Majnún Khán, and would not believe that the Emperor was near at hand.

On Sunday, the 1st Zí-l hijja, the Emperor made his dispositions for action. He himself took command of the centre. Asaf Khán and all the Atkas 2 were on the right; Majnún Khán and other amirs were on the left. This day His Majesty rode an elephant called Bálsundar, and Mirzá Koka, who bore the title of 'Azam Khán, was seated in the howda with him. The enemy, being now fully aware of the Emperor's advance, prepared themselves for death. They drew out their forces, and sent a body of men to oppose the advanced guard of the Emperor.3 Bábá Khán Kákshál, who commanded the advance, repulsed them and drove them back upon the lines of 'Ali Kuli Khan. In the confusion, the horse of one of the fugitives ran against the horse of 'Alí Kulí Khán, and the Khán's turban fell off. Bahádur Khán saw this, and his spirit being roused, he made a bold charge upon the advanced guard under Bábá Khán, and drove it back upon the ranks of Majnún Khán. Bahádur Khán in the pursuit came between these two forces. He fought manfully, but his horse, being i wounded by an arrow, became unmanageable, and he was thrown to the ground and made prisoner.

As the battle grew hot, the Emperor alighted from his elephant and monnted a horse. Then he gave orders for the elephants to be driven against the lines of 'Ali Kuli Khan. There was among them an elephant named Hiránand, and when the approached the ranks of the enemy, they let loose against thim an elephant called Diyana; but Hiranand gave him such a butt, that he fell upon the spot. 'Ali Kuli Khan received a wound from an arrow, and while he was ougaged in drawing it out, another arrow struck his horse. The animal became restive, and 'Ali Kuli Khin also was thrown. An olephant named Narsing now came up, and was about to crush him, when 'Alí Kuli Khan cried out to the driver, "I am a great man; if you take me alive to the Emperor, he will reward you." The driver paid no heed to his words, but drovo the animal over him and lerushed him under foot. When the field was cleared of the enemy, Nazar Bahadur placed Bahadur Khan behind him on a horse, and conducted him to the presence of the Emperor. By the efforts of the amirs he was put to death. After a little while, the head of 'Ali Knli Khan-zaman was also brought.1 The Emperor then alighted from his horse, and returned thanks for this victory. This battle was fought at the village of Mankarwal, one of the dependencies of Josi and Payag, now known as Illahábás, on Monday, the 1st Zí-l hijja, 974 H.

While the Emperor was on his campaign against Khán-zamán, the author's father remained at Agra, in the performance of his duty to the Emperor, and the author himself was at Agra with him. Every day turbulent and designing men spread disastrous liews. One day I said to one of my companions, "Suppose we set some favourable reports affeat?" and he asked what we should say, and I replied, "Let us say that nows has come that they are bringing in the heads of Khán-zamán and Bahádur interview. The amirs promised to sue for the pardon of Sikandar, and swore that they would make no attack on the lives or property of him or his men. Upon this agreement, they separated, and each party went to his own side.

Sikandar then made two days' march, and wrote to the amirs, stating that the rise of the waters had prevented his staying on the banks of the river. On hearing of his departure, the amirs went after him. When they reached Gorakhpúr, they discovered that he had crossed the river and gone off. The country before them belonged to the Afgháns, into which they could not enter without the order of the Emperor. They wrote a statement of the position to Court, and received an answer to the effect, that as Sikandar had left the Imperial territory, it was unnecessary to pursue him. His estates and jägirs were given to Muhammad Kulí Khán Birlás. The amirs, on being acquainted with the contents of the letter, left Muhammad Kulí Khán, and returned to Court.

Conquest of the Fort of Chitor.3

Many samindars and rájús of Hindústán had become subjects of the Imperial throne. But Ráná Udí Singh, Rájá of Márwár, confident in the strength of his fortresses, and the number of his men and elephants, had thrown off his allegiance. Now that the Emperor had returned to the capital, with his mind at rest in respect of 'Alí Kulí Khán and other rebels, he turned his attention towards the capture of Chitor. He accordingly began to make preparations for the campaign. The pargana of Bayána was taken from Hájí Muhammad Khán Sístání, and given in jágir to Ksaf Khán, who was ordered to proceed thither, and collect provisions and materials for the army. The Emperor followed to the town of Bárí, with the avowed intention of hunting, and there killed a thousand animals in sport. Then ho ordered his army to be brought up, and proceeded onwards to Mú-maidána. When he reached the fort of Súpar, ho found that, hearing of his approach, the men who garrisoned that fort for Rúí Surjan of Rantambhor, had abandoned it and fled to Rantambhor. The fort was placed in charge of Nazar Bahádur, one of the Imperial adherents. From thence he went on to Kota, one of the parganas of that country, of which he made Sháh Muhammad Khán Kandahári the governor. Next he marched to Gágrún, on the borders of Málwa.

Mirzá Ulúgh and Mirzá Sháh, sons of Muhammad Sultán Mirzá, had fled from Sambal, and had come into these parts, where they had begun a revolt, which the Emporer deemed it necessary to suppress. He therefore appointed Shahábu-d dín Ahmad Khán, Sháh Bidágh Khán, Muhammad Murád Khán, and Hájí Muhammad Sístání to júgirs in Mandú, and charged them with that duty. When the amirs reached Ujjain, which is one of the chief places in that country, they found that the Mirzás, on hearing of the Emperor's approach, had assembled together and fled to Gujarát, to Changíz Khán, the ruler of that country, who had been one of the adherents of Sultán Mahmúd Gujarátí. So the amirs obtained possession of Mandú without opposition.

When the Emperor marched from Gágrún, Ráná Udí Singh left seven or eight thousand men to hold Chitor, under the command of a Rájpút named Jai Mal, a valiant chief, who had fought against Mirzá Sharafu-d dín Husain, in the fort of Mírtha, as beforo related. The Ráná himself, with all his relatives and dependents, took refuge in the hills and jungles.

The fort of Chitor is seated on a hill, which is about one kos in height, and has no connexion with any other hill. The length of the fortress is three kos, and the width half a kos. It contains plenty of running water. Under His Majesty's orders, the ground round the fort was portioned out among the different amirs.

The royal forces were ordered to plunder and lay waste the country, and Asaf Khán was sent to Rúmpúr, a prosperons town of the province. He attacked and captured the fort, and ravaged all the neighbourhood. Husain Kulí Khán was sent with a detachment towards U'dipúr and Kombalmír, which is one of the chief fortresses in that country, and is the residence of the Rúná. He ravaged several towns and villages, but finding no trace of the Rúná, he returned to the Imperial camp.

When the siege of Chiter had been earried on some time, the Emperor ordered the construction of sabats, and the digging of mines. About 5000 builders and carpenters and stonemasons were collected, and began their work of constructing sabats on two sides of the fort. A sabat is a kind of wall which is began at musket-shot distance (from the fort), and under the shelter of its planks strongly fastened together and covered with raw hides, a kind of way (kucha) is conducted to the fortress. The walls are then battered from it with gams, and a breach being made, the brave assailants rush into the fort. The sabat which was conducted from the royal battery (morchal-i badshahi) was so extensive that ten horsemen abreast could ride along it, and it was so high that an elephant-rider with his spear in his land could pass under it.

While the sabat was in course of construction, the garrison kept up such a fire of gams and muskets, that more than 100 of the workmen and labourers employed in it were killed daily, although they covered themselves with shields of bull-hide. Corpses were used in the walls like bricks. In a short time, the sabat was completed, and carried close to the fort.

About fifty miles S.E. from Chitor. Asaf Khan had proviously reduced the fort of Mandal (the "Mundalour" of Malcolu's map, ten miles S.E. of Gagran ?).—

² Thirty-four miles N.W. of Udipur.

The miners also carried their mines to the foot of the walls, and having constructed mines under two bastions which were near together, they filled them with gunpowder. A party of men of well-known bravery, fully armed and accoutred, approached the bastions, ready to rush into the fort as soon as a breach was made by the explosion of the mines. Fire was applied to both mines at the same time, but the match of one was shorter than the other, and that made the explosion first. The bastion was blown into the air, and a large breach was effected. storming party at once rushed to the breach, and were about to enter, when the second mine exploded, and the bastion was blown up. Friends and foes, who were contending in the breach, were hurled into the air together, and those also on whom the stones fell perished. It is notorious that stones of 200 mans were carried to a distance of three or four kes from the walls, and bodies of men who had been burnt were found. Jamalú-d dín and * * * and a great number of the Emperor's attendants, were slain, and nearly 500 picked soldiers were killed \\ \ by blows from the stones. A large number also of the infidels perished.

After this disaster, the pride and solicitude of the Emperor became still more intent upon the reduction of the fortress. A sábát which had been laid down in the battery of Shujá'at Khán was now completed. On the night of Tuesday, 25th Sha'bán, 975 m., the Imperial forces assembled from all sides, and the wall being breached, a grand struggle began. Jai Mal, commander of the fortress, came into the breach to encourage his men. The Emperor was seated in a gallery, which had been erected for him on the sábát, and he had a musket in his hand. The face of Jai Mal was discernible by the light which was cast upon the spot by the fire of the guns and muskets. The Emperor took aim at him, and so wounded him that he died upon the spot. The garrison was disheartened by the fall of their leader, and each man hurried to his own home. They collected their wives and children, property and effects, in one place, and burnt them. This proceeding, in the language of the infidels of Hind, is called jauhar. The royal forces were now massed, and they assaulted the breaches in several places. Many of the infidels rushed forward to defend them, and fought most valiantly. His Majesty, seated on the sábát, beheld the exertions of his men with an approving eye. 'Adil Muhammad Kandahárí * * * and others exhibited great valour and daring, and received great praise. All that night the fighting went on, but in the morning, which was a glorious morning, the place was subdued. The Emperor mounted on an elephant, and, attended by his devoted followers on foot, entered the fortress. (An order for a general massacre was issued, and more than 8000 Rájpúts who were in the place received the reward of their deeds.\(^1\) After noon the slaughter was stayed, and the Emperor returned to his camp, where he remained three days. Asaf Khán was appointed to rule this country, and His Majesty started for the capital, on Tuesday, the 25th Sha'bán.

A curious incident in this siege was this: A person was sitting near the battery of the author of this book, under the shelter of a tree, with his right hand placed upon his knee. As an opportunity presented itself, he raised his thumb, covered with the stall usually worn by archers, and just at that moment a gun was fired from the fortress, and the ball passed within the length of a barley-corn from his thumb, and did him no harm.

When the Emperor started to effect the conquest of Chitor, he vowed that if he were successful, he would make a pilgrimage to the tomb of Khwája Mu'ínu-d dín Chishtí, which is at Ajmír. In performance of this vow, he set off for Ajmír, and walked all the way on foot. On Sunday, the 7th Ramazán, he reached Ajmír. He performed all the observances of the pilgrimage, and made the poor and needy glad with his alms and offerings. He remained there ten days, and then departed for the capital.

Thirteenth year of the Reign.

The beginning of this year corresponded with Thursday, 14th Ramazán, 975 m. (14th March, 1568). At the beginning of this year the Emperor left Ajmir, and proceeded by way of Mewat towards Agra. On his journey, he passed a jungle which was the abode of liens (sher) and tigers (babar). A terrible tiger (sher)1 came out, and His Majesty's followers, who were constantly in attendance upon him, discharged their arrows and stretched him in the dust. His Majesty then gave orders, that if a like thing should occur again, they were not to shoot until he directed them. As they went on, another tiger (sher), larger and fiereer than the first, came ont and made towards tho Emperor. No one of the attendants dared to fire without orders. The tiger-hunting King alighted from his horso and levelled a musket at the beast. The ball grazed the animal's face, inflicting a slight wound, which caused him to rush from his place towards His Majesty. The Emperor fired a second time, and brought him down. At this juncture, 'Adil Muhammad Kandahárí, boldly placed an arrow to his bow, and faced the animal, which then turned away from the Emperor and attacked him. It brought him to the ground, and was about to take his head in his mouth. /That brave fellow, in this supreme moment, thrust his hand into the animal's mouth, and sought to draw his dagger to stab him in the belly. But the handle of the dagger stuck in the sheath, and the beast gnawed the flesh and skin of the hand which was in his mouth. Notwithstanding this, 'Adil managed to draw his dagger, and inflicted some deep wounds in the animal's belly. Brave men gathered round on all sides and finished him. 'Adil Muhammad received a sword-cut besides the wounds the tiger had given him. He lay for some time on the bed of pain before he died of his wounds.

After the tiger hunt the royal camp moved towards Alwar, and directions were given that it should proceed thither, while the Emperor himself went to pay a visit to Shaikh Nizam Narnauli. He then returned to the camp, and proceeded with the army to the capital.

 $^{^1}$ It was in all probability a tiger, although the author would seem to use the words sher and babar distinctively.

After a stay of some months at Agra, the Emperor resolved to attack the fort of Rantambher, renowned as one of the strengest and highest fortresses of Hindústán. An order was issued for the assembling of those troops which had not been engaged in the siege of Chitor. Ashraf Khán Mir-munshi and Sádik Khán were sent on this service with a large portion of the Imperial army. When these amirs had marched several stages, intelligence reached the Emperor of disturbances created by the sens of Muhammad Sultán Mirzá, who had escaped from the hands of Changíz Khán, in Gujarát, and had laid siege to the fort of Ujjain, in Málwa. The Emperor then directed that Kalíj Khán, with the amirs and the army that had been sent to Rantambher, should undertake the repression of the revolt of the Mirzás.

The two forces united according to the order. On approaching Sironj, Shahábu-d dín, the ruler of that sarkár, came forth to meet them. He jeined them and marched on with them. When they encamped at Sáraugpúr, Sháh Bidágh Khán joined them with his forces. The army had new grown very large. When the Mirzás were apprised of its approach, they raised the siege of Ujjain, and went off towards Mandú. Muhammad Murád Khán and Mirzá 'Azízu-lla, who had been besieged in Ujjain, being thus released, came out and joined the amirs. All marched together in pursuit of the Mirzás, who fled before them from Mandú to the banks of the Nerbadda. They crossed this river in such confusion that many of their men were drowned. Just at this time Jajhár Khán Habshí murdered Changíz Khán, the ruler of Gujarát, in the tirpauliya maidán of Ahmadábád. When the Mirzás heard of this, they seized the chance which it afforded, and fled to Gujarát. The Imperial amirs turned back from the river Nerbadda, and the jágirdárs of Mandú returned to their jágirs. Kalíj Khán and the other amirs proceeded to Court, and were received with royal favour. On reaching Gujarát, the Mirzás first seized upon the fort of Chámpanír, and then marched against Broach, to which they laid seige. After a while, they by stratagem got into their power Rustam Khán Rúmí, who was besieged in the fort, and put him to death. The remainder of this transaction will be told in its proper place.

In the course of this year Mír Muhammad Khán-i kalán, Kutbu-d dín Muhammad Khán, and Kamál Khán Ghakar, jágirdárs of the Panjáb, were summoned to Court. hastened to obey, and in Rabi'u-l awwal, 976 H., thoy arrived and made their offerings. Husain Kuli Khán and his brother Isma'il Khán were summoned from Nágor, and appointed to the government of the Panjáb instead of them. The jágir of Muhammad Khán-i kalán, in tho sarkár of Sambal, became a tankhwih. Whon the Emperor marched to conquer Rantambhor, Husain Kulí Khán was his personal attendant in the campaign. But after the reduction of Rantambhor, and the return of His Majesty to Agra, Husain Kulí Khán and his brother Isma'il Kulí Khán took leavo and departed to the Panjáb. On the 1st Rajab, the Emperor marched from Agra against Rantambhor. Proceeding to Dehli, he stayed there some days and went out to a kamurgha hunt, in the neighbourhood of Pálam, where four or fivo thousand animals were killed.

Fourteenth year of the Reign.

The beginning of this year agreed with 5th Ramazán, 976 H. (22nd February, 1569). The Emperor marched at the opening of the year towards Rantambhor, and in a short period arrived at the foot of the fort. The place was invested, batteries raised, sabats constructed, and several breaches were effected by battering with cannon.

Rái Surjan, the commander of the fort, when he observed the progress of the siege, was brought down from the pinuacle of his pride and insolence, and he sent out his two sons, Dudh and Bhoj by name, to ask for terms. His Majesty received kindly the two young men, who had come to seek his mercy, and pardoned their transgressions.) He sent Husain Kuli Khan, who had received the title of Khan-jahan, into the fort to give assurances to Rái Surjan. He did so, and brought the Rái to wait upon the Emperor, when he made a frank submission, and was enrolled among the royal servants.1 On Wednesday, 3rd ~ Shawwal, the conquest of the fortress was accomplished, and on the next day the Emperor went in to examine the place. placed Militar Khán in command of the fortress, and then prepared to return to the capital. Leaving the army under the command of Khwaja Aminu-d din Mahmud, who was entitled Khwaja-jahan, and Muzasfar Khan, the Emperor left them to conduct the army back to the capital, while he made a hasty journey to pay a visit to the tomb of Fáízu-l anwar Khwaja Mu'inu-d din Chishti. He remained there a week, and then departed for Agra, where he arrived on Wednesday, 4th Zi-l ka'da, 976. Darbar Khan, one of his personal attendants, had been compelled by sickness to continue with the army, and he died before His Majesty reached Agra. Upon his return His Majesty went into the Khan's dining-hall, and made a princely provision for his family.

Foundation of the town of Fathpur.

The Emperor had several sons born to him, but none of them had lived. Shaikh Salim-Chishti, who resided at the town of Sikri, twelve kos from Agra, had gladdened him with the promise of a son. The Emperor went to visit the Shaikh several times, and remained there ten or twenty days on each occasion. He commenced a fine building there on the top of a hill, near the Shaikh's monastery. The Shaikh also commenced a new monastery and a fine mosque, which at the present day has no equal in the world, near the royal mansion. The amirs also built houses and mansions for themselves. When one of the Emperor's wives became pregnant, he conveyed her to the dwelling of the Shaikh, and left her there. Sometimes he stayed there himself, sometimes at Agra. He gave the name of Fathpur to Sikri, and built a bāzār and baths there.

Conquest of Kalinjar.

This is a strong fortress, and many former Sultáns had been ambitious of taking it. Sher Khán Afghán (Sher Sháh) besieged it for a year, but was killed in the attempt to take it, as has been narrated in the history of his reign. During the interregnum of the Afgháns, Rájá Ram Chandar 1 had purchased the fort at a high price from Bijilli 2 Khán, the adopted son (pisar-i khıcanda) of Bihar Khan Afghan. The renown of the conquest of the forts of Chitor and Rantambhor spread through the world, and the men of the Imperial army who held jagirs in the neighbourhood of Kálinjar were constantly forming plans for the capture of that fort, and were anxious to begin the war. Rájá Rám Chandar was a prudent and experienced man, and considered himself an adherent of the Imperial throne. He sent by his envoy the keys of the fortress and suitable offerings, with congratulations for the victories achieved, to the Emperor. On the same day the custody of the fortress was given into the charge of Majnún Khán Kákshál, one of the jagirdars of that quarter, and a friendly farmán was sent to Rájá Rám Chandar. The fortress came into the possession of the Emperor in the month of Safar, 977 H., in the fourteenth year of his reign.

Birth of Prince Sultan Salim Mirza.

On Wednesday, 18th of Rabi'u-l awwal, 977 m., and the fourteenth year of the reign, when seven hours of the day had passed, the exalted prince Sultan Salim Mirza was bern in the house of Shaikh Salim Chishti, in the town of Fathpur. The Emperor himself was in Agra at the time, and the joyful tidings was conveyed to him by Shaikh Ibráhím, son-in-law of Shaikh Salim, who was right royally rewarded. In thanksgiving for this happy event, gifts were distributed among the people, prisoners were set free, and great feasts were held, which were kept up for seven days with great pleasure and rejoieing. The date of the birth is found in the words Sháh-i ál i Timúr. Kliwája Husain, composed an ode, of which the first line contained the date of the Emperor's accession, and the second the date of the prince's The Khwaja received a present of two lacs of tankas for this ode, and several other peets received rewards for their productions. The Emperer mado Fathpur 1 a royal abede, raised a stone fortification round it, and built some splendid edifices, so that it became a great city. Before the prince was born, the Emperor had resolved in his own mind, that if the Almighty granted his wishes, he would go a pilgrimage on feet to the shrine of Murádu-l anwar Kutbu-l wásilin Khwaja Mu'inu-d dín Chishtí. Having prepared his offerings, on Friday, the 12th Sha'ban, 977, he started on foot from Agra for Ajmir. Every day he travelled seven or eight kos. He visited the shrine, and performed the usual observances immediately upon his arrival. He passed some days there, and then left Ajmir for Dehli, where he arrived in Ramazán, 977.

Fifteenth year of the Reign.

The beginning of this year corresponded with Saturday, the 6th Shawwal, 977 H. (14th March, 1570). * * * On Thursday, the 3rd Muharram, 978, the star of good fortune shene, and tho

Emperor had another son, Prince Murád, borne to him in the house of Shaikh Salím. In gratitude for this blessing, he opened the hand of liberality, and gave away many munificent gifts, and men were enriched by his bounty. The nobles and officers of the Court presented offerings suitable to their respective ranks, and received robes of honour. Mauláná Kásim Arslán on this occasion wrote a couplet, of which the first line contained the date of the birth of Prince Salím, and the second that of Prince Murád.

March of the Emperor to Ajmir.

The Emperor was accustomed, wherever he might be, to pay a visit every year to the tomb of Mu'inu-l hakk wau-d din Hasan Sanjarí at Ajmír. In this happy year, on the 8th Rabí'u-l ákhir, 978, he started for that place, in order to show his gratitude for the boon granted to him. He stayed twelve days at Fathpur, in order to make some necessary arrangements for his journey. He arrived at Ajmir in due course. To show his favour, and to improve the condition of the place, he ordered a strong wall to be built round it, and a palace to be erected in it for his own residence. The amirs and kháns, and attendants of the Court, vied with each other in erecting dwellings there. distributed the villages and lands and houses of Ajmír among his amirs, to enable them to pay the expenses of the new . buildings. On Friday, 4th Jumáda-l ákhir, he left Ajmír, and arrived in sight of Nágor on the 16th. Here there is a large tank, which he ordered his soldiers to dig and fill with water. He himself inspected the tank, and gave it the name of Shukr taláo.

While he was thus staying at Nágor, Chandar Sen, son of Ráí Máldeo came to pay his allegiance, and make his offerings. Rájá Kalyáu Mal, the Rájá of Bikanír, also came with his son, Ráí Singh, to wait upon His Majesty, and present his tribute. The loyalty and sincerity of both father and son being manifest, the Emperor married Kalyán Mal's daughter. For fifty days he shed the light of his justice and equity upon the poor people of Nágor. From thence he proceeded to Ajodhan, to pay a visit to the temb of Shaikh Farídu-d dín Mas'ud Ganj-i shakar. Ráí Kalyán Mal, who was so fat that he could not ride on horseback, how received permission to return to Bikanír; but his son was ordered to remain in attendance upon His Majesty, in which he received high promotion, as will be related in the proper place.

^{1 &}quot;Ruler of Marwar."—Badauni, vol. ii. p. 133.

There were many wild asses (gor-khar) in this desert country, and His Majosty, who had never hunted this animal, was desirous of doing so. One day as he was journeying on, the scouts brought information that there was a herd of wild asses in the vicinity of the camp. Ho immediately mounted a fleet courser, and after a ride of four or five kos, came in sight of the herd. He got off his horse, and commanded all his followers to remain quiet. He himself, with four or five Bilúchis, who were acquainted with the country, approached the herd with guns in their hands. At the first shot he struck an ass, and the remainder of the herd, being frightened by the noise, dispersed. His Majesty cautiously approached, and struck another, and so on, until sixteen asses fell by his hand. That day he travelled nearly seventeen kos in hunting, and at the close returned to the camp. By his order the sixteen asses were brought to the camp in carts, and their ficsh was distributed in front of the royal tent among the amirs and courtiers. he proceeded towards Ajodhan; and on arriving in sight of the place, he went on immediately, and performed all the ceremonies of pilgrimage, and distributed his bounty among the poor. * *

From thence he proceeded towards Lahore, and when he arrived at Dípálpúr, the jágirdár of that pargana, Mirzá 'Azíz Muhammad Kokaltásh, who bore the title of 'Azam Khán, and was well known as Mirzá Koka, prepared an entertainment, and begged him to stay there a few days and rest. His Majesty graciously consented, and remained there. For some days feasting went on, and upon the last day splendid offerings were presented to him. Arab and Persian horses, with saddles of silver; huge elephants, with chains of gold and silver, and housings of velvet and brocade; and gold and silver, and pearls and jewels, and rubies and garnets of great price: chairs of gold, and silver vases, and vessels of gold and silver; stuffs of Europe, Turkey, and China, and other precious things beyond all conception. Presents of similar kind also were presented for the young princes and the Emperor's wives. All the ministers and attendants and dignitaries received presents, and every soldier of the army also participated in the bounty.

The beginning of this year corresponded with Sunday, 17th Shawwál, 978 H. (13th March, 1571 A.D.)

At the beginning of this year His Majesty departed from Dípálpúr for Lahore, and Hasan Kulí Khán, the governor of that city, hastened forth to receive him. Leaving his camp at Malkapúr, the Emperor went on speedily to Lahore. He passed that day and night in the house of Hasan Kulí, and next day the Khán presented his gifts. On the following day the Emperor returned to the camp, and after spending a few days in the vicinity of Lahore, he set off for Hisár-Fírozah, on a visit to the shrine of Khwája Mu'ínu-d dín.

Náhíd Begam was wife of Muhibb 'Alí Khán son of Mír Khalífa, and her mother was wife of Mirzá 'Isá Tarkhán, the ruler of Thatta. Mirzá 'Isá being dead, Náhíd Begam had received leave from His Majesty about a year before this date to go to Sind, to see her mother, and bring the daughter of Mirzá 'Isá to pay homage to the Emperor. Muhammad Bákí Tarkhán now occupied the seat of his father, and would have nothing to do with Náhíd Begam. She therefore returned in anger to the Emperor, and made a statement of the harshness and tyranny of Muhammad Bákí, and of the disrespect he had shown to the Emperor's servants. She said that if the Emperor would permit and support her husband Muhibb 'Alí Khán, he 10 of could easily offect the conquest of Thatta. As Núhíd Begam it was returning from Thatta, she had some conversation at Bakar ú with Sultan Malunud Bakari, who was one of the officers of Mirzú Shúh Husain Arghún, and his koka; and, after the death of Mirzá Sháh, Bakar remained in his possession. This Sultán Mahmúd Salúi Samarkandí told Náhíd Begam that if Muhibb 'Alí Khán would undertake the conquest of Thatta, he would join and assist him, and that he would have no need of any further support. In consequence of this promise, Nahid Begam N. was very desirous of going to Sind. Muhibb 'Alí Khán had fas for a long time given up the military life, so the Emperor the granted him a banner and a kettle-drum, and he gave him aises jágir of fifty lacs of tankas in the sarkár of Multán, towards the cet expense of the campaign. He also sent with him his daughter's glit son Mujahid, a young man of resolution and courage, and hothis wrote a farmán to Sa'id Khán, the ruler of Multán, directing him to support Muhibb 'Alí Khán.

When the Emperor left the Panjáb for Fathpúr his royal residence (dáru-l khiláfat), he sent Muhibb 'Alí on his expedition. Upon arriving at his jágír in Multán, Muhibb 'Alí set about collecting men, and got together nearly 400 horse. Relying upon Sultán Mahmúd Bakarí, he wrote letters to him, and began his march. But Sultán Mahmúd was adverse to the entrance of any Imperial forces into his territory, so, disregarding the promises he had made to Náhíd Begam, he sent to say that he would not allow Muhibb 'Alí to pass through his country; but that if Muhibb 'Alí would march by way of Jesalmír, he would send his army to him, and render him all the assistance; he could.

Muhibb 'Alí, and his grandson Mujáhid, took a bold course, and proceeded towards Bakar. Sultán Mahmúd sent his whole army to oppose them, but his men were defeated, and obliged to seek refuge in the fort of Máníla. Mujáhid and Muhibb 'Alí Khán besieged the fort for six months, and at length obtained possession of it by capitulation. At this time Mubárak Khán, a slave of Sultán Mahmúd's, who acted as his vakil, being aggrieved with his master, went and joined Muhibb 'Alí. The latter having increased his force, laid siege to Bakar. Sultán Mahmúd sent out his army, amounting to nearly 2000 horse and 4000 foot, archers, and gunners. They were defeated in battle and driven back into the fort. For three years Sultan Mahmud sometimes daily, sometimes every two or three days, sent out armed ships and ghrabs to fight. Three times he sent ont his whole army, horse and foot, to fight a regular battle, but each time he was defeated. In consequence of the large number of men which he had crowded into the fort, pestilence and sickness1 broke out and became very fatal, so that 500 to 1000 persons died daily. At length, in the year 983, Mahmúd himself died, and the fort came into the possession of the Emperor's adherents.

When the Emperor left the Panjáb and proceeded to Fathpúr, Mun'im Khán Khán-khánán came from Jaunpur, bringing Sikandar Khán with him. The offences of Sikandar Khán were pardoned, and the jágir of Lucknow was conferred upon him. Khán-khánán quickly returned to secure his Bengal frontier. Sikandar Khan also took his leave, and was sent along with Khán-khánán to his jágír. Each received a jewelled swordbelt and four horses with golden saddles. Soon after his arrival at Lucknow, Sikandar Khán fell sick, and died on the 10th Jumáda-l awwal, 979 н.

V Seventeenth year of the Reign.

The beginning of this year corresponded with Tuesday, 25th Shawwál, 979 H. (11th March, 1572 A.D.)

Campaign in Gujarát.2

In the Court of the Emperor conversation continually turned upon the state of affairs in Gujarát, and information was often brought about the oppression and wilfulness of its petty rulers, and about the ruin of its towns and cities. (Now that His Majesty's mind was set quite at rest by the suppression of rebels, and the reduction of their lofty forts, he turned his attention to the conquest of Gujarát.) The order was given for the assembling of the army, and on the 20th Safar, 980, in the eighteenth year of the reign, the Emperor started and proceeded, enjoying the chase on his way, to Ajmír. On the 15th Rabí'u-l awwal, he paid a visit to the tomb of Khwája Mu'ínu-d din Chishti, and gladdened the hearts of the shaikhs and attendants with his munificent gifts. Next day he made a visit to the tomb of Saiyid Husain Kháng-sawár, a descendant of Zainu-l 'ábidín, which is on the top of a hill at Ajmír. Next day, Mír Muhammad Khán Atka, better known by the title of Khán-i kalán, was sent on in advance with 10,000 horse, and His Majesty followed on the 22nd Rabí'u-s sání.

2 "Gujarát had for a long time had no legitimate master, and its amírs were quarrel-

Two stages from Nágor, messengers brought him the news that in the night of Wednesday, 2nd Jumáda-l awwal, a son was born to him [at Ajmír]. He spent several days in rejoicing, and made many happy by his munificence. As the child had been born in the house of Shaikh Dániyál, one of the most pious and celebrated shaikhs of the time, he gave the prince the name of Dániyál. After the rejoicings were over, he again marched and arrived at Nágor, on the 9th Jumáda-l awwal. There he remained fourteen days employed in arranging for the supply of his army.

From thence he marched to Mírath, and there he was informed that when Mír Muhammad Khán came near to Sirohí; the Rájá of that place professed subjection and obedience, and sent some Rájpúts as envoys to wait upon the Mír. The envoys arrived and delivered their message. Mír Muhammad Khán gave them an appropriate answer and fine robes, and then, according to the etiquette observed among the people of India, he dismissed them with his own hand.\(^1\) One of those desperate envoys at that moment stabbed the Khán in the breast, and the weapon pierced through to his back under the shoulder. Bahádur Khán, a young man and a servant of the Khán, who was standing behind Sher Khán, but now has his place among the nobles, rushed forward, and seizing the Rájpút, dashed him to the Muhammad Sádik Khán, who was seated by the side of the Khán, arose and despatched the accursed wretch with his dagger. When this intelligence reached the Emperor, on the same day he sent Lashkar Khán Mir-bakhshi to inquire after Mír Muhammad Khán, and next day he marched forward him-Sádik Muhammad Khán and the other amirs called in surgeons, who dressed the Khán's wounds, and by the Emperor's good fortune the severe wound was cured in fifteen days, and the Khán mounted his horse with his quiver girt upon his loins.

The Emperor continued his march, and on the 8th Jumáda-s sání formed a junction with the advanced force. When he reached Sirohí, eighty Rájpúts in a temple and seventy in the Rájá's house, stood ready to perform the vow they had made to die. In a few moments they were all despatched. Dost Muhammad, son of Tátár Khán, perished in the Rájá's house. At this stage His Majesty resolved to send one of his officers to make sure of the territory of Joudhpúr, and keep the road to Gujarát open, so that none of the Ránás might be able to inflict any loss. This duty was imposed upon Ráí Singh Bikanírí, who was sent with a strong force of Imperial troops. Farmáns were written to the amirs and jagirdars of that province, directing them to render Rai Singh every assistance he might require.

At this stage Yar 'Ali Turkoman, with an escort of Turkománs, came as an ambassador from Sultán Muliainmad Mirzá, and from Shah Tahmasp, King of Khurasan, bringing with them Arab and Persian horses, and other presents. They were received by His Majesty with all due state and honour. The Emperor then marched from Sirohi to Pattan Nahrwala, and when he arrived near the fort of Disa, which is twenty los from Pattan, intelligence was brought that the sons of Sher Khán Fúládí had takon off their troops and families towards I'dar. Tho Emperor sent Rájá Mán Singh in command of a detachment after them. On the 1st Rajab, 980, the army arrived in sight of Pattan, and rested there for a week. The government of the country was conferred upon Saiyid Ahmad Khán Bárha, a man of courage and resolution, who had numerous friends and allies among the Saiyids of Hindústán. At this halt Rájá Mán Singh roturned, bringing in a large booty, which he had taken from the remnant of the Afghans.

The Emperor then marched towards Ahmadábád. Sher Khán Fúládí had been engaged for six months besieging Ahmadábád, which was held by 'Itimád Khán; but when he heard of the Emperor's approach, he took to flight. The Emperor had hardly advanced two stages from Pattan, when Sultán Muzaffar, son of Sultán Mahmúd Gujarátí, whom 'Itimád Khán had kept continually in confinement, came with a great display of respect to meet the Emperor, and on Sunday, the 9th Rajab, was admitted to an interview. Next day, 'Itimád Khán, the ruler of Ahmadábád, Mír Abú Turáb, Saiyid Ahmad Bukhárí, Ikhtiyáru-l Mulk, Malik Ashraf, Wajhu-l Mulk, Ulúgh Khán Habshí, ² According to Abú-! Fazi, Sultán Muzassar separated from Sher Khan Fnladi, and wandered about without aim or purpose. Akbar sent a party to search for him. Jajhar Khan Habshi, and other amers and chiefs of Gujarat, too numerous to mention, came in to wait upon the Emperor, and make their offerings. 'Itimad Khan presented the keys of Ahmadabad, and showed every sign of submission.

Thr officers of the Court were suspicious of evil designs on the part of the Habshis (Abyssinians), and brought the matter to the notice of His Majesty, and although he desired to act generously and royally towards them, as a precaution he committed them to the charge of some of his attendants. The Emperor then marched on, and on Friday, 14th Rajab, pitched his camp on the banks of the river of Almadábád. The khutba was read in the name of the Emperor, and all the people of the city and environs came to offer congratulations and thanksgivings. On the 20th Rajab, Saiyid Mahmid Khán Bárha and Shaikh Mnhammad Bukhári brought their wives into the royal camp. On the same day Jalál Khán, who had been sent on an embassy to a Ráná, returned.

Ibráhím Husain Mirzá and Muhammad Husain Mirzá held Broach, Baroda, and Surat' in defiance of the Emperor, so he resolved to free the country of Gujarát from their rebellious power. On Monday, 2nd Sha'bán, he started from the river of Ahmadábád, and marched towards Kambay. 'Itimád Khán and other of the Gujarát amirs were, at the request of some of the great officials, allowed to remain behind in Ahmadábád for a few days to arrange their affairs. Seizing this opportunity, Ikhtiyaru-l Mulk, one of the chief nobles of Gujarat, fled on the 4th Sha'bán from Ahmadábád to Ahmadnagar. As no reliance could be placed on the nobles of Gujarát, 'Itimád Khán was given into the custody of Sháhbáz Khán Kambú. On the 6th the Emperor reached Kambay. He went to look at the sea, and leaving Kambay on the 12th, he reached Baroda on the 14th. After reflecting upon the best means of guarding and governing the country of Gujarát, he appointed Mirzá 'Azíz Muhammad Kokaltásh the Khán-i 'azim to be the governor of the country, and especially of its capital Ahmadábád.

A detachment sent to invest Surat.

After the departure of the 'Azam-khán, the Emperor determined upon attacking the fortress of Surat, which was the home and stronghold of the Mirzás. To effect this purpose he sent Saiyid Mahmúd Khán Bárha, Sháh Kulí Khán Mahram Khán-i 'álam, Rájá Bhagwán Dás, Kunwar Mán Singh * * * and several others, to overpower Husain Mirzá, who was in Surat. Next day, 17th Sha'bán, when one watch of the night was passed, intelligence was brought in that Ibráhím Mirzá Khán, having heard at Broach of the Emperor's advance, had murdered Rustam Khán Rúmí, and then left the town, intending to pass about eight kos distance from the Emperor's camp, and to raise disturbances and rebellion elsewhere.

On hearing this, the Emperor's wrath was kindled. He instantly gave orders that Khwája-jahán, Shujá'at Khán, Kalíj Khán, and Sádik Khán should take charge of the young prince Salím, while he went to chastise Ibráhím Mírza. He took with him Maliku-sh Shark Gujarátí, who was well acquainted with the roads, and he sent Sháhbáz Khán Mir Bakhshi in all haste, to recall to his side Saiyid Muhammad Khán, and the forces which had marched against Surat. The remainder of that night, and the greater part of the next day, he kept up the pursuit for a long distance. When night came on, he arrived with forty horsemen on the banks of the river Mahindrí. Ibráhím Husain Mirzá was in the town of Sarnál, on the other side of the river. When they heard this, the Emperor's followers endeavoured to conceal themselves.

At this crisis, Saiyid Mahmúd Khán Bárha, Kulí Khán Mahram Khán-i 'álam, Rájá Bhagwán Dás, Kunwar Mán Singh,

* * Bhoj the son of Surjan, and others of the force sent against Surat, by a forced march eame up and joined the Emperor. Kunwar Mán Singh, at his own solicitation, was placed in command of the advanced guard. Although the whole of his followers did not number more than 100 men, the Emperor, without hesitation, determined to attack. They dashed into the river and crossed over.

Ibráhím Husain Mirzá, who had with him about 1000 horsemen, on perceiving this bold movement, went out of the town of Sarnál by another road, telling his men that he intended to give battle in the open. The road between the river and the fort was very broken, so Kunwar Mán Singh, and the advance under his command, took another road, and the Emperor passed by a road to the gate of the town by the water-side. Some of the enemy, whose blood was up, made a stand in the street, and showed fight. Makbúl Khán, a Kalmuck slave, who on that day went in front of the Emperor, cut one of them down, and wounded several others.

It was now discovered that Ibráhím Husain had quitted the town, and the Emperor gave orders for the pursuit. The troops accordingly left the walls and went out into the plain, and there the two parties confronted each other. Ibráhím Husain made an attack upon Bábá Khán Kákshál, who had been sent forward with a party of bowmen. Although these made a stout resistance, they were driven back a short distance. But every man of the Imperial force fought desperately, and killed a great many of the enemy. Bhúpat, son of Rájá Bihár Mal, a very brave young man, made a charge upon the enemy, and fell. Emboldened by his fall, the enemy renewed his attack. But the royal forces were in a contracted spot, where three horsemen could not pass abreast, as it was all hedged in with thorns. The Emperor had, with great courage, gone to the front, and Rájá Bhagwán Dás had kept with him. Three of the enemy's horsemen now charged them, and one of them attacked the Rájá. As his adversary was entangled among the thorns, Rájá Bhagwán Dás hurled his spear at him and severely wounded him, so that he withdrew. The other two assaulted His Majesty, who received them se valiantly that they were obliged to make off.

At this time, Makbúl Khán Ghulám and Snrokh Badakhshí joined His Majesty, and he sent them in pursuit of his assailants. The royal forces, seeing the danger in which the Emperor had been placed, were roused to desperation, and made a fierce onslaught upon the enemy. Ibráhím Husain Mirzá was disheartened, and took to flight. Some brave men pursued him, and cut down soveral mon on their way. But the night came on darker than the fate of that band, so the Emperor gave orders to stop the pursuit. Ibráhím Husain Khán, glad to save his life, mado eff with a few persons by the Ahmadnagar road to Sirohí. The Emperor went into the town of Sarnál, and effered thanks for his victory. Every man who served in this engagement received his reward in increased rank and in jägirs.

Next day the Emperor started on his return to the royal camp, but he sent on in advance Surokh Badakhshi, whose conduct in this affair had gained the royal approbation, to carry news of the victory to the princes. When the news arrived, the princes and the ladies of the harem, and the amirs and the officials, were filled with joy sufficient to last them their lives. On Wednesday, the 18th Sha'ban, when one watch of the night was passed, the Emperor rejoined his camp at Baroda. Next day he conferred a banner and a kettle-drum on Raja Bhagwan Das, who had so greatly distinguished himself in this action.

March against Surat.

The fortress of Surat is small, but exceedingly strong and secure, and remarkable among fortresses. It is said, that a slave of Sultán Mahmúd Gujarátí, Safar Aká by name, who received the title of Khudawand Khan, built this fortress on the seashore 1 in the year 947, in order to resist the attacks of the Europeans, for before the fort was built, the Europeans did all kinds of mischief to the Musulmans. When Khudawand Khan was engaged in the erection of the fort, the Europeans several times fitted out ships to attack it, but could not succeed in their object. Khudáwand Khán then called for his architect, a very elever man, to provide for the security of the fort. After a little reflection, the eareful builder determined on his plan. On the two sides of tho fort which face the land, he formed ditches reaching to the water, which were twenty yards (dará)2 wide, and filled with water; they were built of stone, chunam, and burnt bricks. The thickness of the double walls 3 is five yards, and the height twenty yards, and these are likewise built of stone, chunam, and burnt brick. The thickness of the four walls is fifteen yards, and the height twenty yards. It is a remarkable circumstance that each stone is firmly fastened to the next with eramps of iron, having molten lead poured into the interstices. The battlements and embrasures are formed of stone, and are formidable to look at. On the top of the tower there is a chaukandi, which, in the opinion of Europeans, is an invention of the Portuguese. When the Europeans were unable to prevent the erection of the fortress by force of arms, they offered large sums of money to prevent tho raising of this structure. But Khudáwand Khán, in contempt of the Europeans, rejected their application and raised the structure.

After the death of Changiz Khán, the fortress came into the Manláná, to givo assurances to Ham-zabán and the men of the garrison, and to bring them out with them. An order was also given for a party of trustworthy clerks to be sent in to seize upon all property, live stock and dead stock, and take care that nothing was lost. The names of all the people in the place were written down, and the list was presented to the Emperor. Kásim 'Alí and Khwája Danlat Názir, by order of His Majesty, brought Ham-zabán and all the men before him, and Ham-zabán, for all his fluency, hung down his head with shane, and could not speak. In gratitude for the victory, the Emperor pardened the common people and inhabitants of the place, but Ham-zabán and some others, who were the instigators of all the strife, were punished and kept in custody. This conquest was effected on the 23rd Shawwál, in the year 980.

Next day the Emperor went in to inspect the fortress. After much consideration and examination, he gave orders for the necessary repairs and improvements. During his inspection some large mortars (deg) and gnns (zarba-zan) attracted his attention. Those mortars bore the title of Salaimání, from the name of Sulaimán Sultán of Turkey. When he made his attempt to conquer the ports of Gujarát, he sent these mortars and some gnns, which are in the fort of Junágarh, with a large army by sea. As the Turks were unable to excreme the difficulties and obstacles they encountered, and were obliged to return, they left these mortars and the gnn which is now in Junágarh on the sea-shore, and returned to their country. The mortars remained upon the sea-shore until Khudáwand Khán built the fortress of Surat, when he placed them in the fort. The one which was left in the country of Súrath was taken to the fort of Junagarh by the ruler of that country. As there was no great necessity for these mortars in the fort of Surat, the Emperor gave orders for their being removed to Agra. On the same day he placed the enstedy of the fort and the government of the country in the hands of Kalij Khan. On the last day of the month Raja Bihar Jia, Raja of the country of Baglana, captured and sent to His Majesty's presence Sharafu-d din Husain Mirza, who for ten years past had been engaged in various turbulent and rebellions proceedings. His Majesty's anger had been roused by the disturbances of the country's peace, so he censured the Mirza and placed him under restraint.

The names "Surat" and "Surath" are identical, both being derived from the Sanskrit Surashtra; but as they belong to very different places, a distinction in spelling has been maintained. "Surat" is the city; "Surath" is a prant or district of Kattiwar, of which Junagarh is the chief town.

When the Emperor had settled to his satisfaction all the affairs of the province, on Monday, 4th Zi-l ka'da, 980, he marched towards Ahmadábád. When he came to Broach, the mother of Changiz Khán complained to him that Jajhár Khán Habshí had unjustly killed her son, and the order was given for Jajhár Khán's being brought up to answer the charge. Upon being questioned, Jajhar Khán acknowledged the deed, and the Emperor, in his indignation, ordered him to be cast under the feet of an elephant.

Various Events that occurred during the Siege of Surat.

While the Emperor was engaged in the siege of Surat, several events occurred. Among them was the journey of Ibráhím Husain Mirzá to Hindústán, for the purpose of raising disturbances. After his defeat at Sarnál, Ibráhím fled to the neighbourhood of Pattan, where he joined Muhammad Husain Mirzá and Sháh Mirzá, and informed them of his escape, and of the siege of Surat. After consultation it was resolved that Ibráhím Husain Mirzá should go into Hindústán and create disturbances, while the other two Mirzás, along with Sher Khán Fuládí, laid siege to Pattan: their expectation being that the Emperor, on receiving intelligence of these proceedings, would abandon the siege of Surat, and fall back upon Ahmadábád, to repress these two outbreaks.\(^1\) Having induced Sher Khán Fuládí to join them, they invested Pattan. Saiyid Ahmad Khán Bárha (the governor) put the fort in order, and shut himself up. He sent an account of the investment to the Emperor, who, on hearing it, issued orders that Kutbu-d dín Muhammad Khán and \(^\) all the jágirdárs of Málwa, Ráísín, and Chanderí, and all the other nobles and adherents of the Imperial throne, such as \(^\) should assemble under the command of 'Azam Khán to repress this rebellious attempt.

The nobles accordingly joined 'Azam-Khan and marched to Pattan. When they were five kes distant from Pattan, Muhammad Husain Mirzá and Sher Khán Fúládí camo forward to meet them.2 The Mirzás fell upon the advance and defeated it. They then attacked the right, which was under Kutbu-d din Muhammad Khán, and defeated it also. Sháh Muhammad Atka received a wound and fled. These two divisions being broken, fled towards Ahmadábád. Kutbu-d dín's camp was plundered, and Shaikh Muhammad Bukhárí 3 was killed. When Azam Khán saw the defeat of his right and left, and the fall of Muhammad Bukhárí, he resolved to make a bold attempt to retrieve matters, and to dash into the fight. But Bidágh Khán, who was himself a man of war, held his bridle, and would not let him go. When the enemy's men dispersed in search of plunder, and there remained but few in array, 'Azanı Khán, with Bidágh Khán, formed his ranks and fell upon the enemy's centre. By God's help, victory declared in their favour, and the foe was scattered on every side.4 Sher Khán Fuládí, in a forlorn and helpless state, went to Amín Khán, the ruler of Junágarh, and there found refuge. Muhammad Husain Mirzá fled to the Deklin. This victory was won on the 18th Ramazán, 980.

'Azam Khán, after setting things in order at Pattan, left Saiyid Ahmad Khán Bárha in command as before, and went to the Emperor, whom he joined under the fort of Surat, on the 20th Shawwál, and reported the devotion and bravery of the amirs and all the troops. On his way back, he sent Kutbu-d dín Muhammad Khán and some other amirs to Ma'múrábád, in order to chastise Ikhtiyáru-l Mulk¹ and the defeated troops who were scattered in the jungles and forts. Kutbu-d dín drove Ikhtiyáru-l Mulk and the other Habshis out of the jungles, took possession of the forts, and left his own garrisons in them. When the Emperor departed from Surat for Ahmadábád, Kutbu-d dín Muhammad Khán, and the amirs who had taken part in his campaign, joined him on the road at the town of Mahmúdábád.

Eighteenth Year of the Reign.

The beginning of this year corresponded with Wednesday, 5th Zí-l ka'da, 980 (11th March, 1573). The Emperor arrived at Ahmadábád on the last day of Zí-l ka'da, and there he entrusted the government of Gujarát to Khán-i 'azam (Mirzá Koka).² On the 10th Zí-l hijja, the 'I'd-suha, he commenced his journey to the capital. On the 18th Zí-l hijja, at the town of Haibatpúr, one of the dependencies of Pattan, he gave fine robes and horses to 'Azam Khán and the other amirs, and dismissed them to their jágírs. At the same place, Muzaffar Khán (late King of Gujarát) received the Imperial bounty. The sarkárs of Sárangpúr and Ujjain in Malwa were taken from the Rání and granted to him, with fifty lacs of tankas in jágír.³ He was then sent to his jagir. The Emperor continued his journey by Jálor towards Fathpur. At one stage from Ajmír, ho received a communication from Sa'id Khan, the governor of Multan, to inform him of the death of Ibrahim Husain Mirza.

When Ibráhím Husain Mirzá hurried off from Gujarát, ho proceeded to the town of Mírtha.\(^1\) At eleven kos from that place, he plundered a caravan which was on its way from Gujarát to Agra. Upon reaching Nágor, Farrukh Khán, son of Khán-i kalán, who governed there on behalf of his father, withdrew into the fort,\(^2\) and the Mirzá, after plundering the houses of the poor people in the environs of the city, went on to Nárnanl. Ráí Rám and Ráí Singh, whom the Emperor had left at Joudhpúr with about 1000 horse to keep open the communications when he marched into Gujarát, gathered their men and pursued the Mirzá. On reaching Nágor, they joined Farrukh Khán, and continuing the pursuit, they came up with the Mirzá one evening at the village of Katholí,\(^3\) twenty kos from Nágor, but he took the alarm, and managed to make his escape.

On the 2nd Ramazán, 980, the troops halted on the banks of a great tank, when the Mirzá, who was only a little in advance, turned back and attacked the troops which were in pursuit of him. The troops held their ground and defended themselves. Three times the Mirzá, forming his men in two divisions, attacked them on two sides, and showered arrows upon them. Finding he could make no impression, he again fled. One division got separated in the darkness, and the men were scattered in the neighbouring villages, where they were taken prisoners, and many of them were put to death. Nearly 200 fell alive into the hands of Farrukh Khán and the amirs of Joudhpúr.

The Mirzá, with about 300 men who accompanied him, plundered the villages and places in their road, and crossing the Junna and Ganges, he proceeded to the pargana of 'Azampúr, in the district of Sambal, which had been his jágir while he was loyal to the Emperor. Ho stayed there five or six days, and then started for the Panjáb. He plundered Pánipat, Sonpat, Karnál, and other places on his route. Many plunderers and adventurers joined him, and inflicted great wrongs upon the people.

When he reached the Panjáb, Husain Kulí Khán Turkomán, Amiru-l umara of the Panjab, was engaged with the forces of his province in besieging Kángra, well known as Nagarkot. On hearing of the Mirzá's arrival, Husain Kulí Khán set off with his brother Isma'il Khan * * * and other amirs, and by forced marches came up with the Mirzá near the town of Tulambha, forty kos from Multán. He was returning from hunting free from apprehension and in disorder, when he was attacked. His men were dispersed, and were unable to reach him. His brother Mas'ud Husain Mirzá, who had come up before him, attacked the troops of Husain Kulí Khán, but was taken prisoner. Ibráhím Husain Mirzá, being unable to do anything, made off. Upon arriving near Multán, he wanted to pass the Gára, which is the name of the river formed by the junction of the Biyáh and Satlej. But it was night, and he had no boats, so he rested on the bank. A party of Jhils, who are fishermen dwelling about Multán, made an attack upon him in the night, and the Mirzá received a wound in his throat from an arrow. no other means of escape, he quickly changed his clothes, and separating from his people, endeavoured to get away. But some of the people of that country recognized him, took him prisoner, and carried him to Sa'id Khán at Multán, and in the custody of the Khan he died.1

On the 12th Muharram, 981, in the eighteenth year of the reign, the Emperor paid a visit to the tomb of Khwája Mu'ínu-d dín Chishtí, and observed the usual ceremonies, and dispensed his customary gifts. He remained there a week, and every morning and evening paid a visit to the tomb, showing strict attention to all the observances. From thence he started for the capital, and on reaching Sangánír, he left his camp and went on express with a few attendants to Fathpúr. In two nights and one day he reached the town of Bachúna, twelve kos from Fathpúr. To secure an auspicious time, he remained there three days, and on the 2nd Safar he arrived at Fathpúr.

March of Husain Kuli Khán against Nagarkot.

(There was a brahman named Brahma Dás, a bard (bád-farosh), who was distinguished above all his compeers for his skill in celebrating the achievements of great men, and he used to make excellent Hindí verses. He was some years in the service of the Emperor, and was admitted among the number of his private attendants, when he received the title of Kab Ráí, chief of poets).

When the Emperor's favour was alienated from Rájá Jai Chandar, Rájá of Nagarkot, he issued orders for putting him in confinement. The Rájá's son, Badí Chand, although a minor, assumed the place of his father, and deeming him as dead, broke out in revolt. The Emperor having given to Kab Ráí the title of Rájá Bírbal,² bestowed upon him the country of Nagarkot.

hereupon farmans were sent to Husain Kulí Khán, and the amirs of the Panjáb commanding them to take Nagarkot from Badí Chand, and place it in the possession of Rájá Bírbal.³ Bírbal in Hindí significs courageous and great, so his title means "Brave and mighty Rájá."

In the MSS, the name is more frequently written "Birbar"; but the more familiar form has been here adopted.

³ Abú-l Fazl places this transaction in the seventeenth year of the reign,—Akbar-ndom, vol. ii. p. 426.

When the Rájá arrived at Lahore, Husain Kulí Khán, * * * and other nobles of the Panjáb, set out for Nagarkot. On reaching Damharí, the holder of that place, whose name was Choto, and who was a relative of Jai Chand, relying on the security of his fort which he had strengthened, kopt himself in private, and sent two vakils with his offerings. He also sent a message excusing himself from attending in person, on the ground of his fears and anxiety, but he undertook the duty of keeping the roads clear. Husain Kulí Khán presented the vakils with robes and sent them back. Leaving a party of men at a village situated near the opening of the road, he went onwards.

On arriving at the fort of Kútila, he pitched his camp. This fort is a very high one. It formerly belonged to Rájá Rám Chandar, of Gwálior; but Rájá Dharm Chand and Rájá Jai Chand had obtained possession of it by force.

The officers left in charge of the fort by Rájá Jai Chand discharged muskets and arrows and stones against the troops who had dispersed in search of plunder, and inflicted some damage. Upon hearing of this, Husain Kuli Khán mounted his horse with the other amirs to reconnoitre the place. He ascended a hill which is opposite to the fort, and commands it. With great labour some guns were brought up the hill, and fire was opened upon the fort. Its eracked masonry was shattered by the balls. A large number of men stood under the walls, and great loss was suffered. As evening approached, he returned to the camp, leaving a force in charge of that position. the night, the Rajputs who were in the fortress, and were terrified by the cannonade, made their escape. In the morning Husain Kuli Khán, beating his drums, marched into the fort of Kútila, which ho delivered over to the Rájá of Gwalior, to whose ancestors it had formerly belonged; but he left a garrison of his own there.

Continuing his march, he came to a thickly wooded country, through which it was difficult even for an ant or a snake to creep; so a party of men was set to cut a road through the jungle. On the 1st Rajab, 990, he encamped by a field of maize near Nagarkot. The fortress (hisár) of Bhún, which is an idol temple of Mahámáí, and in which none but her servants dwelt, was taken by the valour and resolution of the assailants at the first assault. A party of Rájpúts, who had resolved to die, fought most desperately till they were all cut down. A number of Brahmans, who for many years had served the temple, never gave one thought to flight, and were killed. Nearly 200 black cows belonging to the Hindús, during the struggle, had crowded together for shelter in the temple. Some savage Turks, while the arrows and bullets were falling like rain, killed these cows one by one. They then took off their boots and filled them with the blood, and cast it upon the roof and walls of the temple.

The outer fortifications having fallen, the buildings were destroyed and levelled to make a camping ground. After this the fort was invested. Sábáts were formed, and a mound commanding the fort (sar-kob) was raised. Some large guns were also placed upon a neighbouring hill, and were fired several times a day upon the fort and the residence of the Rájá. One day the commander of the artillery fired a large gun upon a place which the Rájá had thought to be safe, and in which he was sitting at meat. The ball struck the walls, and killed nearly eighty people who were within the building. Among them was Bhúj deo, son of Rájá Takhat Mal.

In the beginning of Shawwal, letters came from Lahore with the intelligence that Ibrahim Husain Mirza had crossed the Satlada (Satlej), and was marching upon Dipalpur. Husain Kuli Khan held a secret council with the amirs about the course necessary to be pursued. The army was suffering great hardships, and the dogs in the fortress were anxious for peace, so Husain Kuli Khan felt constrained to accede. The infidels undertook to pay a large tribute: five mans of gold, Akbarsháhí weight, and various kinds of stuffs for His Majesty. A mosque was founded in front of the palace of Rájá Jai Chandar, and after the completion of the first arch a pulpit was raised, and Háfiz Muhammad Bákir read the khutba in the name of the Emperor on Friday, in the middle of Shawwál, 980. As he repeated the titles of the Emperor, gold was showered upon his head. When peace was concluded, the khutba read, and the coins stamped with the Emperor's name, Husain Kulí Khán marched away.

He then proceeded against Ibráhím Husain Mirzá. At the town of Jamárí he paid a visit to the holy Khwája 'Abdu-sh shahid, who presented him with his garment, and sent his blessings with him. When he reached Tulambha, he achieved the victory, which has already been described. Upon His Majesty arriving at Fathpur after his campaign in Gujarát, Husain Kulí Khán took Mas'úd Husain Mirzá with him, and went to wait upon the Emperor. The other prisoners, nearly 300 in number, were presented to the eyes of the Emperor with cow-hides placed on their necks in a strange fashion.1 eyes of Mas'úd Husain Mirzá were sewed up, but the Emperor in his kindness ordered them to be opened. Several of the prisoners were liberated, but some, who had taken a leading part among the rebels, were kept in custody. On the same day Sa'id Khán arrived, bringing with him as an offering the head of Ibráhím Husain Mirzá, and he received distinguished marks of favour.

When the Emperor returned from Gujarát, there remained no resistance in that country, all the forts were in the hands of his servants, and such of his troops as had not served on the campaign were sent to strengthen 'Azam Khán. But he had hardly been six months in his capital, when news of fresh outbreaks came in time after time, and 'Azam Khán himself wrote for reinforcements.

Events which occurred in Gujarát.

When the Emperor had settled the affairs of Gnjarát, and had returned to his capital, the disaffected and rebellions men, who had crept into corners and hidden themselves in dread of the royal forces, once more raised their heads. Having assembled round Ikhtiyáru-l Mulk, they got possession of Ahmadnagar and the surrounding territory.

Muhammad Husain Mirzá left the Dekhin² with the intention of attempting the recapture of Surat. Kalíj Khán, who was jägirdár of the fort, made it secure, and prepared for a siege; so Husain Mirzá gave up the project, and made a rapid march upon Kambáy.³ Hasan Khán Karkaráh, the shikkdár, being unable to make any resistance, fled to Ahmadábád.⁴

Khán-i 'azam sent Naurang Khán and Saiyid Ahmad Bukhárí against the Mirzá, while he himself marched to Ahmadnagar and I'dar against Ikhtiyáru-l Mulk. When Naurang Khán and Saiyid Bukhárí approached Kambáy, Muhammad Husain Mirzá came out to meet him. Sharp fighting went on for several days, and Saiyid Jalál, son of Saiyid Baháu-d dín Bukhárí, was killed. At length the Mirzá was worsted, and fled to join Ikhtiyáru-l Mulk. 'Azam Khán, who had marched against Ikhtiyáru-l Mulk, took a position near Ahmadnagar. He several times attacked him, and fighting went on for several days between Ahmadnagar and I'dar with no decisive result.

Intelligence now came that the sons of Sher Khán Fuládí, the son of Jajhár Khán, and Mirzá Muhammad Husain had joined Ikhtiyárn-l Mulk, and had formed the plan of making a rapid march by a different road to Ahmadábád. On being informed of this, Khán-i 'azam marched for that eity, and when he reached it he sent a messenger to summon Kutbu-d dín Muhammad Khán from Broach, who accordingly marched and joined Khán-i 'azam at Ahmadábád. Ikhtiyáru-l Mulk and Muhammad Husain Mirzá, and the other insurgents, got together a force of 20,000 men—Mughals, Gujarátís, Habshís, Afgháns, and Rájpúts—around Ahmadábád. The Rájá of I'dar also kept up a connexion with them.

Khán-i 'azam and Kutbn-d dín, being unable to depend upon some of their men, shut themselves up in the town, but sallied out every day and fought under the walls. One day Fázil Khán, son of Khán-i kalán, went out and made a bold attack upon the enemy, and killed several men; but he was slain by a thrust from a spear. Khán-i 'azam daily sent off despatches to the Emperor, calling for assistance. The Emperor therefore resolved once more to raise his banner in Gujarát, to clear the country of the rebels, and to uproot their families.

The Emperor summoned his clerks and officials, and gave them directions to provide for the outfit of an army. The former campaign had lasted a year, and the men through the length of the march were without accouraments. After returning they had not had sufficient time to get money from their jágirs to replace their necessaries. His Majesty therefore issued money from the public treasury to the soldiers, and made liberal grants for procuring the materials of war. He sent Shujá'at Khán¹ on in advance with his camp equipage, and he sent with it his horses under the charge of Khwája Aká Khán. He personally enjoined the diwáni officers to use the greatest despatch in outfifting the army. To expedite matters he on the now fatigued,1 and several of his attendants had dropped behind, so ho stayed a few hours to take rest. After his attendants had come up, he mounted a fast-going cart,2 and travelled all night. On Tuesday he reached the tomb of Khwaja Mu'inu-d din Chishtí (at Ajmír),3 where he went through the usual observances, and bestowed his gifts upon the poor. He rested for a while in the palace, which he had built for his own use, but towards the end of the day he mounted his horse, and continued his journey. Among his attendants when he started were Mirzá Khán, son of Kháu-khánán Bairám, Asaf Khán Koka, Zain Khán Koka, and * * *. The night was bright moonlight. the morning they joined Shah Kuli Khan Mahram, and Muhammad Kulí Khán Tùghbáni, who had been sent on in advance from Fathpur. The intelligencers now brought the information of the royal army having marched. His Majesty alighted at the town of Pálí,4 which was near at hand, and then, having chosen Khwája 'Abdu-lla, Asaf Khán Bakshí, and Ráísál Darbárí, lie took them along with him. On the 2nd Jumáda-l awwal, 981, he reached the town of Disa, twenty kos from Pattan, in Gujarát, where the shikkdar * * came forth to meet him. His Majesty now sent Asaf Khán to Muhammad Khán, directing him to collect his forces, and join the party at the town of Bálísána, five kos from Pattan. In the middle of the night His Majesty started from Dísa for Bálísána, and turning aside from Pattan, came in sight of Bálísána⁵ in the morning, and there halted. Here he was joined by Mír Muhammad Khán with his army and all his amira and attendants, such as  and a party of the principal Rájpúts, such as Khangár, the nephew of Rája Bhagwán Dás, who had previously marched from Fathpúr to support Khán-i azam, but whom caution had restrained from advancing beyond Pattan.

An order was now issued for all the troops to appear fully armed and accoutred. The amirs accordingly brought out their men, and the Emperor reviewed them. Although he had full trust and hope of heavenly assistance, he neglected no material means of success. He gave the command of the centre, which is the place of the Sultán, to Mîrzá Khân, son of (the late) Khán-khánán Bairám Khán, a young man of great parts and promise. He also appointed Saivid Muhammad Khan Barha, a man of great bravery, and Shuja'at Khan and Sadik Khan to the centre. The command of the right was given to Mir Muhammad Khán-i kalán, and that of the left to Wazir Khán. The advance, composed of a number of brave fellows, was placed under the command of Muhammad Kulí Khán and Tarkhán Diwana. His Majesty kept under his own immediate direction 1001 horsemen, men who had been picked out from a thousand thousand—a reserve intended to support any division which might be hard pressed. Strict orders were issued that no man was to stray from his place.

Although the horsemen under his colours were only 3000 in number, and the enemy had more than 20,000, he put his trust in God, and in the latter part of the day marched from Bálísána towards Ahmadábád. A messenger was sent to apprise Khán-i 'azam of his approach. He marched all night, and on Tuesday, 3rd Jumáda-l awwal, he reached Karí, a town twenty kos from Ahmadábád. The scouts now brought in the intelligence that a large force of the enemy had come out of the fort to give battle. Orders were accordingly given to attack them, and drive them from the road, but not to incur any embarrassment by attacking the fort. This was accomplished in the twinkling of an eye, and those of the enemy who escaped the sword, threw themselves into the fort. Leaving the fort untouched, in obedience to orders, the army marched five kes from Karí, where it rested till dawn.

As soon as it was light, the bakhshis drew up the forces, and marched on without drawing rein to a place about three kos from Ahmadábád. Orders were given for every man to arm himself, and the royal armoury was opened, so that every man who had lost or damaged a weapon might choose one to suit him. Asaf Khán was sent to Khán-i 'azam, to inform him of the proximity of the Emperor, and directing him to effect a junction. Thus, in nine days, the Emperor marched from Fathpúr to the outskirts of Ahmadábád, a feat which it is difficult for the pen to describe.

It was now discovered that the enemy, drunk with wine,1 were asleep on the bed of heedlessness, quite unaware of the approach of the royal army. The feeling ran through the royal ranks, that it was unmauly to fall upon an enemy unawares, and that they would wait till he was roused.2 When the blast of the trumpets was heard, the enemy, in amaze and alarm, rushed to their horses.3 Muhammad Husain Mirzá advanced with two or three horsemen to the bank of the river to ascertain the truth, and it so happened that Subhan Kuli Turk had also gone down to the river with two or three men from our side. Muhammad Husain Mirzá called out to Subhán Kulí, inquiring whose army it was, and he was answered that it was the Emperor, who had marched from Fathpur to punish traitors. The Mirzá replied, "My spies have informed me, that fourteen days ago the Emperor was at Fathpur; and if this is the Imperial army, where are the royal elephants which always accompany it?" Subhán 'Alí said, "How could elephants have travelled with us 400 kos in nine days?" Muhammad Husain Mirzá returned amazed and troubled to his army, and drawing out his forces, he prepared for battle. He directed Ikhtiyár Khán to take 5000 horse, and prevent Khán-i 'azám from sallying out of the city.

When the time for delay drew to an ond, the Emperor directed the advance to cross the river, and that Wazir Khán also should cross with the left. This being done, he himself crossed over at the head of his chosen men. Some little confusion occurred in the passage, but the troops all got over together, and advanced a short distance on the other side, when a strong force of the enemy came in view. Muhammad Husain Mirzá, with 1500 Mughals, all devoted men of his own, came up and fell upon the advanced force under Muhammad Kulí Khán and Tarkhán Díwána. Simultaneously the Habshís and Afgháns attacked Wazír Khán, and then the fight grew close and warm.

The Emperor perceived some signs of weakness and distress in the advanced force, so he gave the word, and charged the onemy like a ficreo tiger. Another body of the royal forces came up and took them in flank. Saif Khán Koka mado a rash charge and was killed. Muhammad Husain Mirzá and Sháh Mirzá struggled manfully, but ill-luck attended them, so they turned and fled. The royal troops advanced and cut off some. His Majesty with several of his men drew up and stood fast. Muhammad Husain Mirzá had received a wound, and in his hasto to make his escape, he put his horse at a thorn hedge, but the animal fell. One of the royal troops, a Turk named Gadá 'Alí, who pursued him, throw himself from his horse and made him prisoner.

Wazír Khán on the left fought well and bravely, but the Habshí and Gujarátí troops made charge after charge, until they became acquainted with the defeat of Muhammad Husain Mirzá and Shah Mirza. Then they also turned their backs. Mir Muhammad Khan on the right drove back the sons of Sher Khan Fuladi, and put many of their men to the sword. Victory now declared itself on every side, and His Majesty returned triumphant to his couch, which was placed at the edge of the battle-field, and there he offered up his thanks for the victory vouchsafed.

Gadá 'Alí Badakhshí and a servant of Khán-i kalán now brought in the wounded Muhammad Husain Mirzá a prisoner, each laying claim to the honour of eapturing him. Rájá Bírbal asked him who mado him prisoner, and he replied, "Ingratitude to His Majesty;" and he spoko tho truth. His Majesty spoke a few kind words to him, and gave him into the eustody of Ráí Singh. Among the prisoners taken was a man named Mard Azmáí Sháh, who deelared himself the Koka of Mirzá Ibráhím Husain. His Majesty struck him to the earth with a spear, and the attendants cut him to pieces with their swords. It was afterwards found ont that he had killed in the battle of Sarnál, Bhúpat, brother of Rájá Bhagwán Dás.¹

An hour after the victory was won, another large division of the enemy² made its appearance, and the vedettes brought the information that it was Ikhtiyáru-l Mulk Gnjarátí. He had been charged with the duty of closing the road against 'Azam Khán, but when he heard of the defeat of the Mirzás, he left the city roads and came out into tho field. His Majesty ordered a force to advance and assail him with arrows. When he came in sight, some fierce horsemen charged and overthrew the troop which preceded him. Ikhtiyáru-l Mulk in his fright east a look upon the hill whereon the royal standard was plauted, and he (and his men) ran off on both sides of it in such disgraceful panie that the royal troops pulled the arrows out of the quivers of the fugitives, and used them against them. A Turkomán fit out a thousand boats (kishti) and ghrabs at Agra, had an interview with His Majesty. The revenues of Gujarát had not been paid up satisfactorily, so the Raja was sent to ascertain and settle the assets, and draw up an account of them for the royal exchequer. The Emperor started again at midnight, and rode to Toda, which he reached on the morning of the 6th, and, after resting for a while, he again mounted and reached Basawar in the middle of the night, where he was met by Khwaja-jahan and Shahabu-d din Ahmad Khan, who had come out of Fathpur to meet him. At dawn he again started and went to the town of Bajúna, where he remained till the following day. He then ordered his attendants to march into Fathpur with spears in their hands. He himself followed, riding upon a gray horse, and holding a spear in his hand. Thus he reached Fathpur on Saturday, 7th Jumada-l akhir, having been absent forty-three days.

Events after the Emperor's Return to Fathpur.

On the 25th of Jumáda-l ákhir, the ceremony of circumeising the young princes was performed, amid great rejoicings and congratulations. The time was new arrived for beginning the education of Prince Salím, so on the 22nd Rajab His Majesty appointed Mauláná Mír Kalán Harawí to be his tutor, and to instruct him in the creed and the Kurán.

Muzaffar Khán, who had been formerly appointed to the government of Sárangpúr, in the territories of Ahmadábád, was summoned to Court, and on the 4th Rajab he was appointed wastr or prime minister of Hindústán, and received the additional title of Jumlatu-l Mulkí. The general management of the affairs of the country was committed to his hands.

The debts of Shaikh Muhammad Bukhárí, who was killed at the battle of Pattan, and of Saif Khán Koka, who fell in the second campaign of Ahmadábád, were ordered to be paid out of the public treasury. The total amounted to one lac of Akbar-sháhí rupees, equal to 2500 tumáns of 'Irák. Such a fact has not been recorded of any king in books of history.

Rájá Todar Mal, who had been sent to settle the revenues of Gujarát, having made the necessary arrangements, now returned, bringing the accounts of his settlement, and suitable presents for His Majesty. He was highly applauded. After a few days the Emperor gave him one of his own swords, and sent him along with Lashkar Khán Mír-bakhshí to serve under Khán-khánán Mu'ním Khán, and assist in the conquest of Bengal.

Mír Mulisin Rizwí, who had been sent on a mission to the rulers of the Dekhin, returned, bringing with him the presents they had sent to His Majesty.

On the 16th Shawwal the Emperor went to pay a visit to the tomb of Khwaja Mu'inu-d din at Ajmir, for although he had visited it this year on his return from the second campaign in Gujarát, he had now determined upon an invasion of Bengal; and as this campaign might last longer than a year, he might be prevented from making his usual pilgrimage; so he determined to proceed thither at once, and offer up his prayers for divine help in his war against Bengal. Ho accordingly set out on the 16th Shawwál, 981, and remained till the 20th in the village of Dáír.1 * * * At this place Diláwar Khán, assisted by the Emperor's orderlies (yasáwals), was directed to protect the cultivated land in the vicinity of the camp; and besides that, trustworthy men were appointed to carefully examine the land after the camp had passed, and were ordered to place the amount of any damage done, against the government claim for revenue. This practice became a rule in all his campaigns, and sometimes even bags of money were given to these inspectors, so that they might at once estimate and satisfy the claims of the raiyats and farmers, and obviate any interference with the revenue collections. Continuing his journey, and hunting as he proceeded, he arrived at a spot seven kos from Ajmír, on the 12th Zí-l ka'da.

Next day he went on foot to pay his visit to the tomb, and from thoneo he repaired to his palace in Ajmír. There he remained twelve days, visiting the tomb every day, and enriching the poor with his bounty.

Nineteenth year of the Reign.

The beginning of this year corresponded with Thursday, 17th Zi-l ka'da, 981 H. (11th March, 1574 A.D.)

After paying his visit to the tomb of the holy Khwaja, who is the helper and protector of kings, the Emperor started on his return from Ajmír on the 23rd Zí-l ka'da. Hunting as he went along, he arrived at Fathpur on the 17th Zí-l hijja.

Campaign against Patna and Hájipúr.

Sulaimán Kirání, ono of the amirs of Salím Khán Afghán [Salím Sháh], and ruler of Bengal and Bihár, who had always in his letters acknowledged himself a vassal of the Imperial throne, diod while the Emperer was engaged in his Surat campaign, in the year 981 H. His eldest son Báyazíd succeeded, but he was murdered by the amirs, and the younger son Dáúd was raised to the throne. The Emperer was informed that Dáúd had stepped out of his proper sphere, had assumed the title of king, and through his merese temper had destroyed the fort of Patha, which Khán-zamán built when he was ruler of Jaunpúr. A farmán was immediately sent to Khán-khánán, directing him to chastise Dáúd, and to conquer the country of Bihár.

At that time Dáúd was at Hájípúr, and his chief noble, Lodí, who was in open hostility to him, was in the fort of Rohtás, and set up a claim to independence. Khán-khánán Mu'ním Khán marched with the Imperial forces against Patna and Hájípúr. Lodí, knowing the destruction of the Afgháns to be certain, notwithstanding his hostility towards Dáúd, made a sort of peace with Khán-khánán. The old friendship and respect which Khán-khánán had for the lato Sulaimán Kirání led him to agree that, upon the payment of two lacs of rupces in money and one lac in stuffs as a tribute, the Imperial forces should be withdrawn. Then having sent Jalál Khán Krorí, he entered into a peace with Dáúd.

^{1 &}quot;In consequence of his evil conduct."—Badáuní, vol. ii. p. 173. According to Abú-l Fazl, the nephew and son-in-law of Báyazíd, whose name was Hánsú, took an active part in his removal. He in his turn was killed by Lodí, and Dáúd was placed upon the throne.—Akbar-nama.

But Dáúd was a dissoluto scamp, and knew nothing of the business of governing. At the instigation of Katlú Khán, who had for a long time held the country of Jagannáth and of Srídhar Hindú Bengálí, and through his own want of judgment, he seized Lodí his amiriu-l umara, and put him in confinement under the charge of Sridhar Bengáli. When in prison, Lodí sent for Katlú and Srídhar, and sent Dáúd this message, "If you consider my death to be for the welfare of the country, put your mind quickly at case about it; but you will be very sorry for it after I am dead. You have never given me any good wishes or advice, but still I am willing to adviso you. Act upon my counsel, for it will be for your good. And this is my advice: After I am killed, fight the Mughals without hesitation, that you may gain the victory. If you do not do so, the Mughals will attack you, and you will not be able to help yourself. Do not be too suro about the peaco with the Mughals, they are only biding their time."

The power of Dáúd and of all the Afgháns was on the wane: it was God's will that they should fall, and that the power of the Emperor should be established over the country of Bengal. So Dáúd resolved to put Lodí out of the way, and by so doing to establish his authority to his own satisfaction. Katlú Khán and Srídhar Bengálí had a bitter animosity against Lodí, and they thought that if he were removed, the offices of vakil and wazir would fall to them, so they made the best of their opportunity. They represented themselves to Dáúd as purely disinterested, but they repeatedly reminded him of those things which made Lodí's death desirable. Dáúd, in the pride and intoxication of youth, listened to the words of these sinister counsellors. The doomed victim was put to death, and Dáúd became the master of his elephants, his treasure, and his troops. But he was puffed up with conceit and folly, and took no precautions for combating his enemies, and relying upon that unsatisfactory peace which Lodí had concluded, he banished all care.

When the death of Lodí was reported to Khán-khánán and his circle, which was full of amirs of renown, he at once set his heart upon the conquest of Bengal and Lakhnautí, and marched against Patna and Hájípúr. In high spirits he arrived in the vicinity of Patna. Dáúd now deeply regretted the murder of Lodí, who, by his wisdom, and judgment, and devotion, had kept the affairs of Bengal in order. He marched towards Patna, and was at first resolved upon battle; but he afterwards recoiled from trying an action, and resolved to take shelter in his fortifications. Khán-khánán was delighted when he was informed of this resolution, and he already foresaw the conquest of Patna and Hájípúr. Dáúd, without drawing a sword or shooting an arrow, retired precipitately into the fort of Patna, and set about repairing the works.

Khán-khánán, with the concurrence of the amirs, proceeded to invest Patna. Upon hearing this, the Emperor determined to personally direct the operations against Patna and Hájípúr. After resting for a few days at Fathpúr, he sent off his camp and elephants by land under the command of Mirzá Yúsuf Khán Rizwí one of his chief amirs. He placed Agra in charge of Shahábu-d dín Ahmad Khán Naishapúrí, and embarked on board a boat on Sunday the last day of Safar, 982 H. The young princes went with him. The boats carried all his equipments and establishments, armour, drums, treasure, carpets, kitchen utensils, stud, etc., etc. Two large boats were specially prepared for his own accommodation, in which he embarked with his attendants. The boats required by the amirs for themselves and their establishments were in the rear of the royal boats, and so they started. On arriving at the village of Ratambh, one of the dependencies of Agra, he stopped and sent a letter to Khán-khánán Mu'ním Khán, to give information of his approach. On the 1st Rabí'u-l awwal the expedition proceeded. Every day he left the boat and went hunting on shore. Every day he was joined by fresh parties of troops. [Punishment of a brahman guilty of incest with his daughter.]

On the 23rd of the month the Emperor reached Illahabás, which is situated at the confluence of the Ganges and Jumna. This is a great place of pilgrimage for the Hindús, and contains some fine buildings. It is colebrated in all parts of the world as a holy place of the Hindús, who resort thither from all parts. On the 25th he reached Benares, from whence he sent on Sher Beg Tawáchí in a boat to Khán-khánán Mu'ním Khán, to apprise him of the Emperor's arrival at Benares. At that eity he remained three days taking rest. On the 28th he reached the village of Kori, a dependency of Saiyidpur,2 at the confluence of the Gunti³ and Ganges, and there anchored. Here he was waited upon by Mirzá Yúsuf Khán, who had brought down the army by land. He now determined that until he received accurate intolligence from Khán-khánán, he and the young prince and his wives would go and stay at Jaunpur.5 So he left the army at this encampment, and went up the Gumti in boats to Jaunpur.

On the 2nd Rabi'u-s sani he reached the village of Yahyapur, a dependency of Jaunpur. Here a despatch arrived from Khan-khanan, urging him to march on with all speed. So on the 3rd he sent on the young prince and ladies to Jaunpur, and then departed on his campaign against Bengal.¹ On the 4th the boats foll down the Gumtí to the Ganges, and Mirzá Yúsnf Khán, the commander of the army, waited on His Majesty. It was now arranged that the army should keep within sight of the royal flotilla. On the 6th it encamped in the plain of Gházípúr, and the Emperor went hunting. * * * On the 7th he halted at Gangadáspúr, and here he was met by the cunuch 'Itimád Khán, a distinguished noble, who had been rendering good service in the siege of Patna, and who now made a full report of all the occurrences to His Majesty, and urged him to hasten forward. His Majesty thereupon directed Saiyid Mírak Ispahání, one of his principal attendants, who was learned in charms, to seek an augury in his boeks by sortilege. The augury was favourable, and a few days proved its truth.

On Tuesday, the 8th Rabi'u-s sání, he encamped at the ferry of Chaunsá, and here a despatch arrived from Khán-khánán, reporting that 'I'sa Khán Níází, an Afghán renowned for his eourage, had made a sertie with elephants and a large force from Patna, and had attacked the besiegers. 'I'sá Khán was slain by Lashkar Khán, one of the Emperor's men, and a great number of Afgháns fell. This news was sent on to the princes.

On the following day Diláwar Khán was ordered to transport the army over at the ferry of Chaunsá, and on the 10th the army encamped at the village of Domní, belonging to Bhojpúr. Kásim 'Alí Khán, was now sent to inform Khán-khánán of the near approach of the Emperor, and to inquire what he advised to be done. The Khán advised the Emperor to advance as hitherto, himself by boat and his army by land; and he requested that some horses might be sent to replace those that had been rendered useless by the rains.² Horses and arms were accordingly sent. Khán-khánán and the other amirs advanced two kos from Patna to meet His Majesty, who, on the 16th Rabí'u-s sání, reached his destination, and took up his abode in the tents of Khán-khánán. Great rejoicings followed, and rich offerings were made.

On the 17th Akbar called a conneil of war in the tents of Khán-khánán, when he observed that the siege had now lasted a long time, that he was resolved upon redneing the place, and upon crushing the defenders, so that they should be unable to make any further resistance either in the city or in the country. He thought that the best course to pursue was to first rednee the fort of Hájípúr, which rendered very material assistance to the garrison of Patua, and that their operations must be directed to that object. The Kháns greatly applauded this scheme. At that same conneil Khán-'álam was sont off with three thousand men in boats, with the materials required for a siege. Rájá Gajpati, the zamíndár of that country, who had many armed adherents, was directed to support Khán-'álam.

Next day, the 18th, Khán-'álam erossed the river, embarked immediately, and went to lay siege to Hájípúr, while the troops marched by land. In order to see the field, His Majesty mounted a battery of Sháham Khán Jaláír, which was upon a hill on the bank of the Ganges, and from which Hájípúr was visible. As, however, he could get no certain information of what was passing, in the evening he sent a party of men in three boats toward Hájípúr to gain intelligence. When the euemy saw these boats approaching, they sent eighteen boats full of fighting men against them. But the three Imperial boats prevented them from advancing, and by hard fighting cut their way through, and joined Khán-'álam. Victory now declared in favour of the Emperor. Fath Khán Bárha, commander of Hájípúr, and many Afgháns, were slain, and the place fell into the hands of Khán-'álam. The head of Fath Khán Bárha and the heads of other Afgháns were thrown into boats, and sent to the Emperor. After offering his thanksgiving for this victory, he sent the heads of Fath Khán and of the others to Dáúd, that he might see with his own eyes what had befallen his officers, and might be led to reflect upon his own position. When Dáúd's eyes fell upon these heads, he was plunged into dismay, and set his mind upon flight.

On the same day, the 16th, the Emperor went out upon an elephant to reconnoitre the fort and the environs of the city, and he ascended the Panj-pahárí, which is opposite the fort. This Panj-pahárí, or "Five domes," is a place built in old times by the infidels with burnt bricks in five stages. The Afgháns, who were on the walls and bastions of the fortress, saw the Emperor and his suite as he was making his survey, and in their despair and recklessness they fired some guns at the Panj-pahárí, but they did no injury at all to any one.

When Dáúd saw the Imperial forces swarming in the plain, and when he was informed of the fall of Hájípúr, although he had 20,000 horse, abundance of artillery, and many elephants, he determined to fly, and at midnight of Sunday, the 21st Rabí'u-s sáuí, he embarked in a boat and made his escape. Srídhar the Bengálí, who was Dáúd's great supporter, and to whom he had given the title of Rájá Bikramájít, placed his valuables and treasure in a boat and followed him.

Gújar Khán Kirání, who was Dáúd's minister,¹ brought the elephants out, and fled by the rear of the city. On that dreadful night, a foretaste of the day of judgment, the inhabitants were in a state of bewilderment and despair. Some endeavoured to escape by the river, but through the crowding and struggling many of them were drowned. Others endeavoured to fly by land, but were crushed under the feet of elephants and horses in the narrow lanes and streets. Some in their despair cast themselves down from the walls, and others perished in the meat. When Gújar Khán came to the Punpun¹ river, he passed his elephants over the bridge; but the fugitives in his rear so pressed and crowded upon the bridge that it broke down, and unmbers were precipitated into the water. These who came up afterwards threw away their arms and clothes, and cast themselves naked into the river.

Late at night, when the flight of Dáúd was reported, the Emperor gave thanks to heaven, and as soon as it was light Khán-khánáu having assured himself of the fact, the royal forces entered the city with great display. Fifty-six elephants, which the enemy had been unable to carry off, were found in the city and paraded before His Majesty. The date of the fall of Patna, which was indeed the conquest of Bengal, is found in this line, "Mulk-i Sulaimán zi Dáúd raft" (983).

The Emperor remained in the city till four hours of the day had passed, and having made a proclamation of amnesty to the inhabitants, he lest Khán-khánán in command of the army, while he himself dashed off with a detachment in pursuit of Gújar Khán and the clephants. When he reached the Punpun, he swam over on horseback, and the amirs and soldiers followed his example. Then he gave orders for every officer and man to press on with all his might in the pursuit of the enemy, and he himself spurred forward. The amirs, driving Gújar Khán before them, seeured Dáúd's elephants, and brought them to His Majesty. On reaching the pargana of Daryápúr,2 twenty-six kos 3 from Patna on the banks of the Ganges, they drew rein, and it was found that nearly 400 elephants 4 had been taken. His Majesty halted at Daryápúr, but ordered Shahbáz Khán Mir-bakhshi and Majnún Khán Kákshál to continue the pursuit. They went en to the river Balbhund, seven kos from Daryapur.

There they learned that Gújar, worn out and half dead, had passed over the river, and that some of his men had been lost in the water. Shahbaz Khan and Majnun Khan then returned.

On Monday, the 21st, Khán-khánán, according to orders, came by water to wait upon His Majesty, bringing with him the royal boats and attendant establishments. The Emperor stayed at Daryápúr six days. He appointed Khán-khánán to the government of Bengal, and left him an additional force of 20,000 horse. He increased his military allowances twenty-five or thirty per cent., he gave him all the boats which he had brought down from Agra, and invested him with full power and authority. Then he raised the standard of return, and dismissed Khánkhánán and the other amirs. Next day he marched to the town of Ghiyáspúr on the bank of the Ganges. There he rested four days, employed in the pleasing occupation of viewing the elephants captured from Dáúd and his Afgháns. From thence he determined to go on to Jaunpur rapidly. Leaving the command of the army as usual with Mirzá Yúsuf Khán, he started at midnight of the 2nd Jumáda-l awwal, 982, mounted upon an elephant. In the morning he halted at an encampment of the royal forces between Daryapúr and Ghiyaspúr, where he witnessed some elephant fights.

At this stage Muzaffar Khán, who was formerly a clerk, but now an amir of reputation, was sent along with Farhat Khán, one of the late Emperor's slaves, and now enrolled in His Majesty's service, to besiege the fortress of Rohtás, a very lofty and strong place. And he gave orders that after its capture it should be placed under the command of Farhat Khán, and that Muzaffar Khán should return to Court. On Friday, 3rd Jumáda-l awwal, he proceeded to Patna, and spent a short time in examining the buildings of Daud.1 From thence he started to make the best of his way, and on Saturday, the 4th, he reached the village of Fathpur Sahina, which is twenty-one kos distant, and on Monday, 6th Jumáda-l awwal, at mid-day, he arrived at Jaunpur. Mirza Yusuf Khan arrived with the army on the 7th. The Emperor remained at Jaunpur thirty-three days, devoting his time to making arrangements for the army and the government of the country. He placed Jaunpur, Benares, the fort of Chunár, and sundry other maháls and parganas directly under the royal exchequer, and he gave the management of them to Mirzá Mírak Rizwí and Shaikh Ibráhím Sikri. On the 9th Jnmáda-s sání, 982, he departed from Jaunpúr, and went to Khánpúr, where he stayed four days. Here he was waited upon by Kází Nizám Badakhshí, who [being graciously received and appointed to office] afterwards achieved a high position among the nobles.

A despatch now arrived from Khán-khánán, reporting the capturo of the fort of Garhí. When Dáúd fled from Patna, he went to Garhí. Leaving some trusty men there, he proceeded to the town of Tánda. He made such efforts to strengthen the fort of Garhí that in his vain idea it was impregnable. Khán-khánán marched against Tánda, and arrived near Garhí. As soon as the eyes of the terrified Afgháns fell upon his army, they fled and abandoned the fort, so that he obtained possession of Garhí without striking a blow. This intelligence greatly pleased the Emperor, and he sent letters of commendation to Khán-khánán and the other amirs. Continuing his journey, and hunting as he went, he arrived, on the 8th Jumáda-s sání, at the town of Iskandarpúr, where he received intelligence of the fall of Tánda.

After taking possession of the fort of Garhí, the Imperial forces marched on towards Tánda, which is the capital of the kingdom (of Bengal). Khán-khánán's explorers at first reported that Dáúd intended to make a stand there, and had made his dispositions. Khán-khánán thereupon summened his amirs, and took every precaution for the security of his army. Next day he marshalled his forces, and advanced in great force against Tánda. When Dáúd's spies carried him the intelligence of Khán-khánán's advance, he and his associates thought of the black night of Patna, and fled in dismay, abandoning the town. Thus on the 4th Jumáda-s sání, the capital of Tánda was wen for the Emperor without fighting, and a proclamation of protection was issued to the people.

Again the Emperor was delighted with this good news. determined to go on to Dehlí, and he arrived there on the 1st Rajab. Out of the spoils of Bengal he presented to the nakára-khána of the Khwaja a pair of drums which had belonged to Daud. He also dispensed the usual gifts.

It now came to his knowledge that Chandar Sen, son of Mál Deo, was oppressing the raiyats in the neighbourhood of the forts of Joudhpur and Siwanah, and was creating disturbances. His Majesty sent Tayib Khán, son of Táhir Khán Mir-i farághat the governor of Dehlí, and Súbhán Kulí Túrk, with a suitable force, to chastise him. When they approached, the rebel withdrew with his followers into dense jungles and places hard of access. But some of the fugitives were caught and put to the sword, and the royal troops returned with considerable spoil. In the middle of Ramazán the Emperor started on his return to the capital, and on the same day Khán-i 'azam departed for Gujarát. The Emperor arrived at Fathpúr on the last day of Ramazán.

It had become manifest that much of the cultivable land of Hindústán was lying uncultivated; and to encourage cultivation, some rule for dividing the profits of the first year between the Government and the cultivator seemed to be required. After careful consideration, it was arranged that the various parganas should be examined, and that those which contained so much land as being cultivated would yield a kror of tankas, should be divided off and given into the charge of an honest and intelligent officer, who was to receive the name of krori. The clerks and accountants of the Exchequer were to make arrangements with these officers, and send them to their respective districts, where, by vigilance and attention, in the course of three years the uncultivated land might be brought into cultivation, and the revenues recovered for Government. To carry out these views, a number of the most honest and trustworthy servants of the State were selected, such as * * and appointed to the office of krori. The amirs also were called upon severally to appoint kroris, who were sent into the country upon their responsibility.

At this time Sháh Kulí Khán Mahram, Jalál Khán Korchí, and some other amirs, were sent to effect the reduction of the fort of Síwánah, belonging to the son of Rái Mál Deo. The fort was besieged for a long time, and Jalál Khán Korchí, one of the officers of the Court, was killed there. After that Shahbáz Khán Kambú was sent there, and he took the place in a very short time.

A statement was now received from the ministers (wukald) of Sultán Mahmúd of Bakar, reporting that Sultán Mahmúd was dead, and that they had no confidence in Muhibb 'Alí Khán and Mujáhid Khán. If, therefore, his Majesty would send one of his officers, they would render up the fort into his charge. His Majesty accordingly sent Mír Kísú Bakáwal-begi, who had received the title of Kísú Khán.

In this year a great pestilence (wabá) and famine occurred in Gujarát, and lasted for nearly six months. From the severity of these calamities, the inhabitants, rich and poor, fled the country, and were scattered abroad. For all this, grain rose to the price of 120 tankas per man, and horses and cows had to feed upon the bark of trees.

Defeat of Dàud Khán by Khán-khánán.

After the conquest of Tánda and the flight of Dáúd to Orissa, Khán-khánán devoted his attention to the settlement of the affairs of the country. Then he sent Rájá Todar Mal with some other amirs towards Orissa, in pursuit of Dáúd. He appointed Majnún Khán Kákshál to the government of Ghoraghát. When the Khán proceeded to Ghora-ghát,² Sulaimán Mangalí, the jágirdár of the place, and one of the bravest of the Afgháns, collected a force to resist his taking possession. Some sharp fighting followed, and Sulaimán was killed, and the wives and children of him and of other Afgháns were made prisoners. Immense booty fell into the hands of the Káksháls. Majnún Khán married Sulaimán's danghter to his own son Jabbárí. He then went on to Ghorá-ghát, and after dividing the whole of the country among the Káksháls, he made a report to Khán-khánán.

Rájá Todar Mal, who had been sent in pursuit of Dáúd, when he reached Madáran, was informed by his seouts that Dáúd was engaged collecting men in Dín-kasárí, and that his forces were daily increasing. Todar Mal stopped at Madáran, and wrote a full report from thence to Khán-khánán. On receiving it, the Khán sent Muhammad Kulí Khán Bírlás * * with reinforcements for the Rájá. Upon their arrival, all the chiefs concurred in the expediency of marching to Gowálpára, ten kos from Dínkasárí, with all speed. When Dáúd heard this, he did not fly, but stood his ground at Dharpúr.²

The spics now brought in information that Junaid, son of Dáúd's uncle, a man of high repute among the Afgháns for bravery and resolution, who had formerly come into the service of the Emperor, but fled from Agra to Gujarát, and afterwards came from Gujarát to Bengal, was now at Dín-kasárí, seeking to form a junction with Dáúd. Rájá Todar Mal, with the approval of the other amirs, sent Abú-l Kásim Namakí and Nazar Bahádur to attack Junaid. These men, making light of the matter, neglected the precautions necessary in warfare, and were defeated by Junaid, thus bringing disgrace upon themselves.

Rájá Todar Mal, on receiving the news, with the approval of his amirs, marched against Junaid; but before he could arrive, Junaid had fled into the jungles. Todar Mal therefore stopped at Midnapúr. Muhammad Kulí Khán Bírlás died here after a few days' illness. He was an able man, and his loss was a great cause of weakness in the Imperial forces.

In concurrence with the remaining amirs, Rájá Todar Mal returned from Midnapúr to Madáran. Here Kiyá Khán Gang, boing offonded with the other amirs without reason, went off into the jungle. Todar Mal reported the fact to Khán-khánán, and remained for some days in Madáran. Hercupen Khán-khánán sent Sháham Khán Jaláír and * * * to support Rájá Todar Mal. When they joined the Rájá at Bardwán, the Rájá left them, and went out into the jungle after Kiyá Khán, and having pacified him, brought him back with him. From Madáran they marched to Jitúra. There they were informed that Dáúd, with his forces, had gone into the fort of Katak Banáras, and was engaged in preparations for war.

Rájá Todar Mal halted, and sent swift messengers to inform Khán-khánán of the position of affairs. Khán-khánán then left Tánda to march against Dáúd, and he formed a junction with Rájá Todar Mal. Dáúd had organized his army and now advanced to meet him. The Afgháns entrenched their camp.

On the 20th Zí-l ka'da, 982,3 the armies met.4 After the array was formed, the Afgháns advanced rapidly and boldly to the attack. Khán-khánán ordered fire to open upon them from the swivels (sarb-san) and light guns (sambúrak), which were mounted on arábas in front of his line. Tho fire of the guns drove back the elephants which were placed in front of the Afghán attack, and the musketry mowed down the Afgháns who were in the advance. Gújar Khán, with his division in

Mr. Blochmann finds the locality of the battle in the Trigonometrical Map of Orissa, in two places called Mughulmari (Mughal's fight), and "Tookaroe," a village about seven miles southwards, half way between Mughulmari and Jalesar (Jellasore), and two miles from the left bank of the Soobanreeka river, lat. 21° 53'. excellent order, now came up boldly, and drove back Khánkhánán's advanced force upon the Allamsh.\ Khán-i 'álam, who commanded the advance, held his ground, and was killed. The Allowsh division was next defeated and driven back upon the centre, which in its turn was in great difficulty. khānān did all in his power, but could not restrain his men. this time, Gújar Khán attacked and wounded Khán-khánán, and as the latter had no sword, he returned Gújar Khún's cuts with slashes of his whip. In this conjuncture Khún-khúnún's horse took fright; and although his rider was auxious to stop him and rally the fugitives, he could not restrain him. The Afghans pursued Kháu-kháuán for half a kos, when Kiyá Khún Gaug attacked the Afghans, and showered arrows upon them. The Afghans were exhausted by their long ride, and could not move. Then Khan-khanan got his horse under control, and rallying his men, led them back to the field. They discharged showers of arrows, and by the guidance of fate, an arrow struck Gujar Khán, and brought him down. When the Afgháns saw their leader fall, they turned their backs and fled; but many of them were ent down in their flight. Rájá Todar Mal, Lashkar Khúu, and others who were upon the right, now charged the left of the enemy. Sháham Khán and others, who were on the left, also attacked their opponents of the right, defeated them, and drovo them back upon Dand. His elephants, being worried by the arrows, turned round upon the body of his army, and the stone of dismay was east among them. The banner of Khún-khúnún now became visible, and the death of Gujar Khun came to the knowledge of Daud. This shook his resolution, and he turned and fled. Immense booty fell into the hands of the victors, and Khán-khánán encamped victorious on the battle-field. He remained there a few days, to have his wounds tended, and sent a report of the victory to the Emperor. All the prisoners taken were put to the sword. Lashkar Khun Mir-bakhshi, who had .

rondered such good service, died of his wounds before the army moved.

Conclusion of peace with Daud. His interview with Khan-khanan.

After his defeat, Dáúd fled to Katak Banáras (Cuttack), in the eentre of Orissa, and Khán-khánán, who remained stationary on account of his wounds, held a council, in which he and his amirs determined to pursue Dáúd.1 Rájá Todar Mal and * * * were directed to proceed after him, and it was agreed that Khánkhánán himself would follow as soon as his wounds permitted. The Rájá and his amirs accordingly started, and did not halt until they reached Kalkal-ghátí.2 After resting there a while, the seouts brought in the intelligence that Dáúd and the Afgháns, with their wives and children, were shut up in the fort of Katak Bauaras. Reduced to extremities, and having no other refuge, the men were resolved upon fighting, and fugitives from the field of battle daily gathered round them. Rájá Todar Mal sent a report of the state of affairs to Khán-khánán,3 and the Khán set out for Katak Banáras, never resting till he came within two kos of that place. Then he held a council with his amirs, and having pitched his camp on the banks of the Mahá-. nadí, which is half a kos from Katak, he began to collect materials for a siege.

Dáúd had suffered several defeats in succession, and Gújar Khán, his mainstay and support, was slain. Death stared him in the face; so, in his despair and misery, he sent a messenger to Khán-khánán with a message to this effect: "The striving to crush a party of Musulmáns is no noble work. I am ready to submit and become a subject; but I beg that a corner of this wido country of Bengál sufficient for my support may be assigned to me. If this is granted, I will rest content, and never after rebel." The amirs communicated this to Khán-khánán, and after considerable discussion, it was determined to accept the proposal, upon the condition that Dáúd himself should come out to meet Khán-khánán, and confirm the agreement by solemn binding oaths.²

² Abú-l Fazl calls the place "Bhadrak." The "Bhudruck" of Thornton, north of Cuttack. Badauni and Faizi Sirhindi follow the Tabakdt, and have "Kalkalghati."

Next day 3 Khán-khánán ordered a grand Court to be held, and all the nobles and attendants to be present in their places in fine array, and tho troops drawn up in arms in front of the tents. Dáúd came out of the fort, attended by his Afghán nobles and officers, and proceeded to the tent of Khán-khánán. When he approached it, Khán-khánán, with great courtesy and respect, rose up and walked half-way down the tent to meet him. When they met, Dáúd loosened his sword from the bolt, and holding it before him, said, "I am tired of war since it infliets wounds on worthy men like you." Khán-khánán took the sword, and handed it to one of his attendants. Then gently taking Dáúd by the hand, he seated him by his side, and made the most kind and fatherly inquiries. Food and drink and sweetmeats were served, of which the Khán pressed him to partake.

After the dishes were removed, the terms of peace came under discussion. Dáud protested that he would never take any course hostile to the Imperial throne, and he confirmed his promise by the most stringent eaths. The treaty of peace was drawn up, and then Khán-khánán brought a sword with a jewelled belt of great value out of his stores, and presenting it to Dáud, [&]quot;"Raja Todar Mal, who well understood the true position of affairs, though he wrung his hands and stamped his feet (to prevent the armistice), met with no support." He refused to take any part in the settlement.—Akbar-nama, vol. iii. p. 108.

² The terms were that Daad was to do homage of service, to surrender his best elephants, and pay up his tribute. Eventually he was to go to Court and do homage in person, but for the present some relations were to be sent as hostages. His nephew Shaikh Muhammad was the hostage.—Akbar-nama, vol. iii. p. 108.

said, "You have now become a subject of the Imperial throne, and have promised to give it your support. I have therefore requested that the country of Orissa may be settled upon you for your support, and I feel assured that His Majesty will confirm my proposition—granting this to you as my tankhwah has been granted to me. I now gird you afresh with this war-like sword." Then he bound on the sword with his own hands; and showing him every courtesy, and making him a great variety of gifts, he dismissed him. The Court then broke up, and Khan-khanan started on his return.

On the 10th Safar, 983, he reached Tánda the capital, and sent a report of his arrangements to the Emperor, who was greatly delighted and satisfied with the conquest of Bengal. Splendid robes and jewelled swords, and a horse with a golden saddle, were sent to Khán-khánán, and all the arrangements he had made were confirmed.

While Khán-khánán was occupied at Katak Banáras, the sons of Jalálu-d dín Súr, in concert with the zamindárs of Ghorághát, attacked and defeated Majnún Khán, drove him to the neighbourhood of Tánda, and captured the fort of Gaur. Mu'in Khán and Majnún Khán provided for the security of Tánda, and awaited intelligence of Khán-khánan's success. When his return became known, the insurgents scattered and hid themselves in the jungles.¹

√Building of an 'Ibádat-Khána.

The Emperor had from his early youth taken delight in the society of learned and accomplished men, and had found pleasure in the assemblies of men of imagination and genius. He always treated them with the greatest respect and honour, and frequently graced their heavenly meetings. He listened to their discussions of nice points of science, of the ancient and modern history of religions and people and seets, and of all matters of worldly interest; and he profited by what he heard. His great favour for such men, led him at the time of his return from Ajmír in the month of Zí-l ka'da, 982, and in the twentieth year of his reign, to issno his commands for skilful architects and elever builders to erect in the gardens of the royal palace a refuge for súfis, and a home for holy men, into which none should be allowed to enter but saiyids of high rank, learned men ('ulamá), and shaikhs. In obedience to the Imperial commands, skilful architects planned a building, containing four halls (aiwán), and in a brief period completed it. When this happy abode was finished, the Emperor used to go there on Friday nights and on holy nights, and pass the night until the rising of the sun in the society of distinguished men. It was arranged that the western hall should be occupied by saiyids, the south by the learned ('ulama') and the wise, the northern by shaikhs and men of ecstasy (arbab-i hal); all without confusion or intermixture. The nobles and officers of the Court, whose tastes were in unison with those of men of greatness and excellence, were to sit in the eastern hall. His Majesty graced each of the four halls with his presence, and enriched those present with his gifts and bounty. The members of the assembly used to select a number of the most worthy among those present to be presented to His Majesty, and to receive from him handfuls of ashrafis and rupees. Those, who from evil fortune did not participate in the royal bounty in the evening; used to sit down in rows before the 'ibádat-khána on Friday mornings, and receive handfuls of ashrafis and rupees from His Majesty's own hands. This assemblage used frequently to last beyond mid-day on Fridays. Sometimes, when His Majesty was tired, one of the attendants of the Court, in whose kindness and gentleness he had confidence, was deputed to perform this duty. * *

In this year Gulbadan Begam, daughter of the Emperor Bábar, and aunt of Akbar, piously undertook the journey to Mecca. When Gujarát was annexed to the Imperial dominions, he determined that every year one of the officers of his Court should be appointed Mír Hájí, or Leader of the Pilgrims, to conduct a caravan from Hindústán, like the caravans from Egypt and Syria, to the hely places. This design was carried out, and every year a party of enlightened men of Hind, of Máwaráu-n nahr, and Khurásán, received provision for their journey from the royal treasury, and went under the appointed leader from the ports of Gujarát to the hely places. Never before had any monarch provided for the annual departure of a caravan from India, nor had any one furnished means to the needy, to enable them to perform the pilgrimage. Gulbadan and Salíma Sultán Begam 2 now obtained the Emperor's permission to go the pilgrimage, and received from him a sum of money for the expenses of the journey. All the pieus poor who desired to join in the pilgrimage obtained the means of travelling.

Arrival of Mirza Sulaimán.

Mirzá Sulaimán had been ruler of Badakhshán since the time of the Emperor Bábar. He had a son, Mirzá Ibráhím, a fine intelligent young man, who was taken prisoner in battle and killed by the adherents of Pír Muhammad Khán Uzbek, in the year that Mirzá Sulaimán invaded Balkh. Mirzá Ibráhím left a son, Sháh Rukh by name, whom Sulaimán carefully brought up, and to whom, in spite of his tender age, he gave several districts of Badakhshán.

When Sháh Rukh arrived at years of discretion, and Mirzá Sulaimán grew old, some desiguing people incited the youth with stories of his rights. But the Mirzá's wife was a clever woman; she kept a sharp watch over Sháh Rukh, and prevented any outbreak. But when she died, these same people stirred up Sháh Rukh's ambition to be ruler of Badakhshán. He came from Kunduz to Koláb, and being supported by his party, the whole of Badakhshán, from Hisár Shádmán to Kábul, fell into his hands, and he wanted to send his grandfather to join his father.

Mirzá Sulaimán flod in great distress to seek assistance from Muhammad Hakím Mirzá. But ho did not meet with the reception he expected, so he begged to be sent on to the Indus. Hakím Mirzá did not comply with this trifling request. He sent him a party of pretended gnides, who left him at the first stage and fled to Kábul. But Mirzá Sulaimán, trusting in God, continued his journey, and although he was sometimes opposed by the Afgháns, and had to fight his way, and was wounded by an arrow, he at length reached the Indus. Thence he wrote to the Emperor, who sent him 50,000 rupees, horses, and necessaries, by the hand of Khwája Áká Khán, * * * and after some days Rájá Bhagwán Dás² came to the Indus with an escort, and conducted him honourably to Lahore.

At this time a farmán was sent to summon 'Azam Khán from Gujarát, and he arrived at Conrt³ with speed and alacrity. Some cavillers and fault-finders made insinuations about his management of affairs,⁴ and the Khán, in defending himself, passed the bounds of prudence and respect, and made use of unseemly words, which brought upon him the displeasure of the Emperor. Thereupon the Khán, forgetful of his duty, retired to his garden at Ágra, shut himself up alone, and refused admission to everybody.

Mirzá Sulaimán, after staying a few days at Lahore, started for Fathpúr. On reaching Mathúra, twenty kos from Fathpúr, the Emperor sent * * several nobles to meet him, and to arrange for his meeting the Emperor on the 15th Rajab, 983. All the nobles and officers were sent out to the distance of five kos from

Fathpur to receive him. And when intelligence of his having left this stage was brought, the Emperor himself went out on horseback to meet him. Five thousand elephants, with housings of velvet and brocade, with gold and silver chains, and with white and black fringes on their necks and trunks, were drawn up in lines on each side of the road to the distance of five kos from Fathpur. Between each two elephants there was a cart (arába), the chitas in which had collars studded with gold and housings of fine cloth; also two bullock-earts, which had animals that were gold-embroidered headstalls.

When all the arrangements were made, the Emperor went out with great pomp and splendour. Upon approaching, the Mirzá hastened to dismount, and ran forward to His Majesty; but the Emperor observing the venerable age of the Mirzá, also alighted from his horse, and would not allow the Mirzá to go through the usual observances and ceremonies. He fondly embraced him; then he mounted and made the Mirzá ride on his right hand. All the five kos he inquired about his circumstances, and on reaching the palace he seated him by his side on the throne. The young princes also were present, and were introduced to the Mirzá, and after a great entertainment, he gave the Mirzá a house near to the royal palace. On this occasion an order was issued to Khán-jahán, the ruler of the Panjáb, to take 5000 horse and proceed to Badakhshán in attendance on the Mirzá, to recover the country and restore it to him, and then to return to Lahore.

Death of Khán-khánán Mu'nim Khán.

When Khán-khánán, with his mind at ease about Dáúd, returned to Tánda, the capital of the country, under the influence of his evil destiny, he took a dislike to Tánda, and crossing the Ganges, he founded a home for himself at the fortress of Gaur, which in old times had been the capital of Bengal, i and he ordered that all the soldiers and raiyats should remove from Tánda to Gaur. In the height of the rains the people were involved in the trouble of expatriation. The air of Gaur is extremely unhealthy, and in former times, the many diseases which distressed its inhabitants induced the rulers to abandon the place, and raise the town of Tánda. Siekness of many kinds now broke out among the people, and every day numbers of men departed from Gaur to the grave,1 and bade farewell to relatives and friends. By degrees the pestilence reached to such a pitch that men were unable to bury the dead, and east the corpses into the river.3 Every day the deaths of many amirs and officers were reported to Khán-khánán, but he took no warning, and made no resolution to change his residence. He was so great a man that no ono had the eourage to remove the cotton of heedlessness from his ears, and bring him to a sense of the actual position. His own health became affected, and he grew worse, and at the end of ten days, in the month of Safar, 983, he departed this life. His nobles and officers, who had so often met to congratulate him, now assembled to lament him. They placed Sháham Khán Jaláír in eommand,3 and made a report of the facts to the Emperor. Khán-khánán had no son, so all his property escheated to the royal exchequer, and an account of it was made out. When the despatch reached His Majesty, he appointed Khánjahán, who had been supreme governor of the Panjáb, to be governor of Bengal. He raised him to the dignity of amiru-lumará, eommended the raigats and people to his tender eare, bestowed upon him gifts of embroidered coats, jewelled swords, and a riehly-caparisoned horse, and dismissed him to his government. Khán-jahán, furnished with full eredentials, then departed to assume his authority.

Twenty-first year of the Reign.

The beginning of this year corresponded with Sunday, 9th Zí-l hijja, 983 st. (11th March, 1576 A.D.)

Mirzá Sulaimán's Journey to Mecca.

* * The Emperor had determined that Khán-jahán should march with the army of the Panjáb to recover the country of Badakhshán, but fate ruled otherwise. Khán-khánán, the ruler of Bengal, was removed by death, and the Emperor deeming the retention and administration of that country more important than the conquest of Badakhshán, sent Khán-jahán thither. When Mirzá Sulaimán saw this change of fortune, he sought leave of the Emperor, through the officers of state, to go on the pilgrimage. The Emperor complied with his request, and furnished him with 50,000 rupees in cash, besides other things required for the journey. He sent with him, to attend upon him in his journey to the coast, Muhammad Kalíj Khán, one of the chief nobles, who had been appointed governor of Surat. When the Mirzá went on board ship, twenty thousand rupees more were given to him out of the revenues of Gujarát. The Mirzá performed the pilgrimage in the same year, and afterwards returned and recovered his kingdom of Badakhshán.

On the 7th Zi-l ka'da, 984, the Emperor set off on a visit to Ajmir. He hunted as he went, and on the 4th Zi-l hijja he encamped at ten kos from Ajmir. He afterwards, as usual, walked five kos on foot to the tomb of the saint, and after going through all the observances of the pilgrimage, he gave away two thousand rupees in charity.

Twenty-second year of the Reign.

The beginning of this year corresponded with the 20th Zí-l hijja, 984 H. (11th March, 1577 A.D.).

While the Emperor was encamped at Ajmír, the intelligence was brought to him that Dáúd Afghán had flung away the treaty which he had made with Khán-khánán, had risen against the royal authority, and had marched against Tánda. The Imporial officers in that quarter, having no chiof among them on whom they could rely, had abandoned the country, and retired to Hájípúr and Patua. All this commotion had arisen because Khán-jahán had taken his time in going there in consequence of his army being at Lahore. Upon receiving this intelligence, the Emperor sent a letter by Subhan Kuli Turk to Khan-jahan, directing him to take with him all the amirs and jägirdars who had abandoned Bengal, and to march against Dáúd. In twenty-two days Subhan Kulí travelled nearly a thousand kos,1 (!) and delivered the farman to Khán-jahán. The Khán took the field, and advanced into Bengal. He had an action with three thousand men whom Dáúd had left in charge of Garhí, and took the place. Nearly fifteen hundred of the enemy were slain, and many chiefs were made prisoners.

Whilst the Emperor was staying at Ajmír, he sent Kunwar Mán Singh, a brave and able man, with five thousand horse, against Ráná Kíká.² He also sent Kází Khán Badakhshí,  and other ambitious young men with him. Asaf Khán was appointed Mir-bakhshi of this army. His Majesty presented Kunwar Mán Singh and all the amirs and sardárs of the army with robes and horses. After fitting out this army, he started to return home on the 20th Muharram, and reached Fathpúr on the 1st Safar, 985 H,

After his arrival at Fathpúr, messengers arrived with the intelligence that Khán-jahán, after the capture of Garhí, had advanced to the vicinity of Tánda. There he found that Dáúd had evacuated Tánda, and had taken up a position in the village of Ak.³ On one flank was the river, on the other a mountain, and he had thrown up entrenchments to secure his position. Khán-jahán marched against him, and sharp fighting followed. One day Khwája 'Abdu-lla, one of the Imperial officers, advanced from his battery to the edge of the Afghán entrenchment. The enemy sallied forth and attacked him, and he fell, fighting bravely. On hearing of his fall, the Emperor's anger was roused, and he sent an order to Muzaffar Khán, the governor of Patna and Bihár, to assemble all the troops in his province, and to march to the assistance of Khán-jahán. In a few days, a letter arrived from Khán-jahán, with the news that there had been a battle with the enemy, in which the royal troops had fought bravely, and had won a victory, in which they killed the commander of the enemy's army, who was called Khán-khánán.

Defeat of Rana Kika by Kunwar Man Singh.

Ráná Kíká was chief among the Rájás of Hindústán. After the conquest of Chitor, he built a town called Kokanda,¹ with fine houses and gardens, in the mountains of Hinduwára. There he passed his days in rebellion. When Kunwar Mán Sing² drew near to Kokanda, Ráná Kíká called all the Rájás of Hinduwára to his aid, and came out of Gháti Haldeo³ with a strong force to oppose his assailant. Kunwar Mán Singh, in agreement with his amirs, put his troops in array and marched to the battlefield. Some desperate charges were made on both sides, and the battle raged for a watch with great slaughter. The Rájpúts in both armies fought fiercely in emulation of each other.⁴ Nearly 150 horsemen of the royal army were killed, and more than 500 Rájpáts of the enemy's army were sent to perdition.¹ The enemy lost Rámeswar Gwaliárí and his son,² and the son of Jai Mal. On that day Ráná Kíká fought obstinately till he received wounds from an arrow and from a spear; he then turned to save his life, and left the field of battle. The Imperial forces pursued the Rájpáts, and killed numbers of them. Kunwar Mán Sing wrote an account of his victory to the Emperor. Next day he went through the pass of Haldeo, and entered Kokanda. He took up his abode in the house of Ráná Kíká, and again returned thanks to the Almighty (sic). Ráná Kíká fled into the high hills for refuge. The Emperor rewarded Kunwar Mán Sing and his amíra with robes and horses.

Khan-jahan's campaign against Daud.

When the battle fought by Khán-jahán became known to the Emperor, he sent five lacs of rupees by dák-chauki towards defraying the expenses of the army. Orders were given for the despatch of boats laden with grain from Agra, for the use of the army.

Gajpati was a zamindar in the neighbourhood of Hajipur and Patna, who had been enrolled among the partisans of the Emperor. When Muzasiar Khan went with reinforcements to Khan-jahan, leaving this country void of troops, he colleged a party and attacked Farhat Khan and his son Mirak Ravil who were at the station of Arah. In the fight which ensued Furiant Khan and his son were killed. Great disturbances followed and the roads were closed.

When intelligence of this reached the Emperor at Fathpur, on the 25th Rabi'u-l akhir he set off. At five kos distance he made a halt, and issued orders for the assembling of troops, and for the preparation of boats and artillery. Here he was waited upon by 'Abdu-lla Khan, whem he had sent as a messenger to Khan-jahan, and who now returned to east the head of Daud at the foot of the Emperor's throne. Rejoiced at the victory, he returned to the capital.

Saiyid 'Abdu-lla Khán thus rohearsed the stery of the victory. Muzasiar Khán arrived with the forces of Bihár, Hájípúr, and Patna, ameunting to nearly 5000 horse, and jeined Khán-jahán. On the 15th Rabí'u-l ákhir, 984, they drew out their forces and attacked the enemy. Dáúd also, supported by his uncle Junaid Kirání and other Afghán chiefs, made his dispositions. Junaid was struck by a cannon-ball. His leg was broken. After a while the armies closed with each other, and the enemy was defeated. Dáúd being left behind, was made prisoner, and Khán-jahán had his head struck off, and sent it to His Majesty. Great spoil and many elephants fell into the hands of the victors. * * *

At this time, Sultan Khwaja was appointed Mír Hají, and a sum of six lacs of rupees in each and goeds was assigned for the benefit of the poor people about to make the pilgrimage to the hely places, and given inte his charge. He was directed to furnish what was necessary to any one desirous of being a pilgrim, and many benefited by this liberality.

[The annual pilgrimage to the tomb of Khwája Mu'inu-d din at Ajmir.]

It has already been related how Rájá Mán Singh defeated Ráná Kíká, and eccupied his country—how the Ráná fled into the high hills, and how the army penetrated to Kekanda, which was the Ráná's home. The reads to this place were so difficult that little grain reached it, and the army was nearly famished. The order was given for Mán Singh to fall back quickly, and he very soon arrived at the Emperor's threne. When the distress of the army was inquired into, it appeared that, although the men were in such great straits, Kunwar Mán Singh would not suffer any plundering of Ráná Kíká's country. This caused the Emperor to be displeased with him, and he was banished from Court for a time. After a while he was forgiven, and was sent at the head of a force to ravage the Ráná's country. It must be understood that in the language of Hind "Kunwar" signifies "son of a Rájá." On the 19th of the month the army marched from Ajmír towards the Ráná's country.

Khwaja Shah Mansur made Diwan.

Sháh Mansúr, a Shírází clerk, at the beginning of his career was employed in the royal perfumery department. But Muzaffar Khán was then in power, and he caused him to be first imprisoned, and afterwards banished from Court. He then entered the service of Khán-khánán Mu'nim Khán at Jaunpúr, and rose to be his diwán. (The conversation of the Khán made his abilities known to the Emperor, and after Khán-khánán's death, Mansúr was summoned to Court, and appointed to the office of diwán in chief.²

Sultán Khwája had been appointed Mír Hájí, or Leader of the Pilgrims, and as the road to Gujarát viá Kokanda was nearest, Kutbu-d dín Khán * * and the other amirs were ordered to escort the caravan through Kokanda. They were directed to plunder and lay waste the country of Ráná Kíká, and to follow him up, and harry him wherever they might hear of him. When Sultán Khwája was about to depart on the pilgrimage, the Emperor, acting after the manner of pilgrims, stripped himself, put on the ihrám or pilgrim's garment, and went some steps after the Khwája. A cry arose from those present, and their voices were raised in benediction and praise.

When His Majesty reached the pargana of Mohi, news came in from the front that Kutbu-d din Khán and the other amirs, on arriving at Kokanda, found that the Ráná had fled into the hills. Orders were then given for Kutbu-d din and Rájá Bhagwán Dás to remain at Kokanda, and for Kalíj Khán and the other amirs to accompany the caravan of pilgrims as far as I'dar. The amirs were to stop at I'dar, and lay siege to it; but they were to send on an escort with the caravan as far as Ahmadábád, forty-eight kos from I'dar. When Kalíj Khán arrived there, he found that the Rájá² had fled into the hills, but that a party of Rájpúts romained in the temple resolved upon death. They were all killed in a short time. Next day Kalíj Khán sent on Tímúr Badakhshí with the caravan to Ahmadábád. Here Shahábu-d din Ahmad * * * and other jágirdárs of Málwa came in to pay their respects.

Grants of mansabs to various chiefs.

When the Emperor reached U'dípúr, a despatch arrived from Sultán Khwája, the Mír Hájí, from the port of Surat, reporting that, owing to no pass (kaul) having been obtained from the Europeans, the ship was useless. The Emperor directed a messenger to be sent to Kalíj Khán to bring him quickly to Surat, in order to secure the departure of the vessel. During Kalíj Khán's absence, Asaf Khán was to have the command of his army.

Kutbu-d dín Khán and Rájá Bhagwán Dás returned from Kokanda, and waited upon the Emperor. Sháh Fakhru-d dín and Jagannáth were left in U'dípúr, and Rajá Bhagwán Dás and Saiyid 'Abdu-lla Khán were left in Dhauli-ghátí of U'dípúr. When His Majesty came into the territory of Bánswála (Bánswára) and Dúngarpúr, the Rájás and samindárs of tho country came to wait upon him with their offerings, and were right royally received. Here also Rájá Todar Mal came from Bengal to wait upon him, bringing nearly 500 elephants from the spoils of Bengal, with other presents and offerings. Kalij Khán also arrived to attend upon him, and was sent to Surat to despatch the ships. Ho went along with Kalyán Rái, a merehant (bakkál); and having got passes (kaut) from the Europeans, he sent off the ships. He quickly returned, and waited upon His Majesty, while he was in Málwa. After arranging his posts (thànaját) to his satisfaction, and securing the loyalty of the zamindárs, he entered Málwa.

Twenty-third year of the Reign.

The beginning of this year corresponded with Tuesday, the 2nd Muharram, 986 n. (11th March, 1578).

The festivals of the Nau-roz and of the Emperor's accession were celebrated in the pargana of Dípálpúr, a dependency of Málwa. The Emperor devoted his attention to measures for increasing the prosperity of this country, and the raiyats waited upon him in parties, and made statements of their circumstances. He paid the kindest attention to every one's case, and made a satisfactory settlement of the affairs of the province. Many zamindárs became submissive and obedient to his will.

Rájá 'Alí Khán, the ruler of Asír and Burhánpúr, had not been duly subordinate, and it being deemed necessary to chastise him, several amirs, such as Shahábu-d dín Ahmad and * *, with other jágirdárs of Málwa, were sent against him. Shahábú-d dín was appointed commander. Shahbáz Khán, the Mir-bokkiii was to check the brands (of the horses) and the muster of the army. The other amirs were to exercise their diligence and secure the speedy departure of the force.

At this same place Réjá Todar Mai was commissional settle the revenue and other affairs of the province of Gujarát. News also was brought from the force at I'dar, that a battle had been fought with Raja Narain Das and a victory gained. The particulars of the occurrence were these: When Muhammad Kalij Khan, in obedience to orders, repaired to the Imperial camp along with 'Alí Murád Uzbek, the army was left under the command of Asaf Khán. Intelligence came in that the Rájá of I'dar, with a number of Rájpúts who had been driven from their homes, together with some zamindars of the country, and supported by Rájá Kíká, had gathered a force which was posted ten kos distance, and contemplated a night attack. When this intelligence was confirmed, Asaf Khan and * * * held a council. About 500 men were left to secure the camp, and the rest of the force was called out at midnight, and marched towards the enemy. On the morning of the 4th Zí-l hijja, after marching seven kos, they encountered the foe, and a battle began. Muhammad Mukim, who led the advance, was killed; but the enemy was defeated. Rájá Náráin Dás fled, and the chiefs of the royal army obtained the victory. Asaf Khán's despatch gave His Majesty much pleasure, and he ordered letters of thanks to be written to the amirs and officers of the army.

When His Majesty had arranged the affairs of Málwa, and settled the matters of the amirs of Asír and Burhánpúr, he turned homewards; and, hunting as he went, he arrived at Fathpúr on Sunday, 23rd Safar. After three months, troubles arose in Gujarát, through the coming thither of Muzaffar Husain Mirzá, son of Ibráhím Mirzá, who was son of the daughter of Kámrán Mirzá. The circumstances of his case are these: When the Emperor was engaged in the siege of Surat, Gulrukh Begam, daughter of Kámrán and wife of Ibráhím, carried off her child Muzaffar Husain, as has been related in the account given of the conquest of Ahmadábád. A disaffected man named Mihr'Alí, a servant of the late Ibráhím Mirzá, who accompanied Gulrukh Begam when she fled from Surat to the Dekhin, now stirred up the ambition of Muzaffar Husain, who was fifteen or sixteen years of age. He induced him to leave the Dekhin, and collecting a number of adventurers from all directions, he entered Gujarát intent upon insurrection.

At this time Rájá Todar Mal was in Pattan, engaged in the settlement of the revenue. The insurrection spread, and the disaffected were everywhere raising their heads. Wazír Khán, the ruler of Gujarát, had 3000 horsemen, but there were amongst them many adventurous men upon whom he could not rely, so he retired into a fortress, and sent an account of the occurrences to Rájá Todar Mal. Before the Rájá came to his assistance, Báz Bahádur, son of Sharíf Khán, and Bábá Gadáí, the diwân of Gujarát, attacked Muzaffar Husain in the pargana of Nandurbár, and were defeated. Muzaffar Husain then went to Kambay, and after staying two or three days, he went off towards Ahmadábád. Rájá Todar Mal turned back from Pattan, and arrived at Ahmadábád.

When the insurgents heard of this, they fell back, and went towards Dúlaka. The Rájá and Wazir Khún pursued them, and coming up with them at Dúlaka, a battle ensued, in which the royal forces were victorious, and the enemy drew off to Júnágarh. Rájú Todar Mal then departed on his return to Court.

Muzaffar Husain, as soon as he heard of the Rájá's departure, came back and besieged Wazír Khán in Ahmadábád; for although Wazír Khán's force was large, it was not trustworthy, and so he was obliged to seek the shelter of the fortress.³ Mihr'Alí, the rakil of Muzaffar Husain, and the great prop of the revolt, brought forward scaling-ladders to attempt an assault, but he was sent to hell 4 by a bullet from the fortress. When he was removed, Muzaslar Husain withdrew, and went towards Sultaupar. So the insurrection came to an end.

Arrival of the anters with an Imperial army at Asir and Burhánpir.

It has been mentioned above, that Shahab Khan and other amirs were sent with 10,000 horse against Ksir and Burhinpiir. When Rájá 'Alí Khún heard of the approach of this force, he drew in his horns and crept into his fortress. The amirs entered the country, and did not stop till they reached Bijanagar.1 Great dissension arose in the country of Asir, and Rujá 'Alí Khán was reduced to beg pardon for his offences. He promised the amirs to send suitable tribute and some elephants in charge of his people to the Emperor's Court. At this time, Kntbu-d din Muhammad Khán separated from the other amirs, and went off to Nandurbár and Sultánpúr, in consequence of disturbances which had arisen in his jughts of Broach and Baroda, through the proceedings of Muzaffar Husain. The disorders in Asir and Burhánpúr which the amirs had been sent to sottle being ended, by the submission of Raja 'Ali and his payment of tribute, the umirs retired to their respective jügirs. When Hakim 'Ainu-l Mulk, who had gone on an ombassy to 'Adil the ruler of the Dekhin, returned, he was sent with the elephants and the tribute to the Imperial Court.

[The annual pilgrimage to Ajmir.]

The Emperor, on his return journey, when he reached the neighbourhood of Ambír,² ordered a fort and town to be founded in the village of Mulathán,³ one of the dependencies of Ambír, on the site of an old city which had been in ruins for some thousand years. Walls and forts, and gates and gardens were allotted out among the amirs, and injunctions were given for the completion of the work. So a building ('imárat), which might liave taken years for its completion, was finished in twenty days. Orders were then given for raiyats and all sorts of mechanics to be collected from all the parganas of that province, to populate the fortress (hisár). The land of this place was an ancient possession of Ráí Lon Karan, and his son, who was young and was being brought up with the princes, was named Manchar, so the town was called Manchar-nagar after that child. This child has now grown up a clever young man, and composes poetry under the takhallus (nom de plume) of Tánsaní.

Appearance of a Comet.3

At this period, at the time of evening prayer, a comet appeared in the sky towards the east, inclining to the north, and continued very awful for two hours. The opinion of the astrologers was, that the effects would not be felt in Hindústán, but probably in Khurásán and 'Irák. Shortly afterwards, Sháh Isma'íl, son of Sháh Tahmásp Safawí, departed this life, and great troubles arose in Persia.

On arriving at Nárnaul, the Emperor paid a visit to Shaikh Nizám Nárnaulí. * * From thence he proceeded to Dehlí, and encamped near the Hauz-i Khás, and paid a visit to the tomb of his father with due ceremony. Then he visited the tombs of the holy men who sleep at Dehlí and dispensed large charities. He next halted at the sarái of Báwalí, and here he was waited upon by Hájí Habíbu-lla, who had visited Europe, and had brought with him fine goods and fabrics for His Majesty's inspection. He started from thence, and passed through the pargana of Pálam. He passed the night in the house of the ^{1 &}quot;Ruler of Sambhar."—Badauni. 2 The celebrated wit and poet.

³ Badáúní (vol. ii. p. 240) places the appearance of this comet in the twenty-second year of the reign. He also records a joke of the time. Sháh Mansúr, the divedn, used to wear a turban with the end hanging down his back; so he got the name of "The Comet," or "Long-tailed Star." Abú-l Fazl likewise places this comet in the twenty-second year of the reign, or 1577 A.D., and according to Fergusson, the comet passed its perihelion on the 26th October, 1577 (Fergusson's Astronomy, vol. ii. p. 234). mukaddam of the village, and in the morning he directed that the revenue officers, whenever he so rested in the house of a cultivator, should remit the tax and tribute (báj o khiráj) of his cultivated land by way of madad-m'ásh,¹ or help for subsistence.²

* * * When he arrived at the pargana of Hánsí, he went to pay a visit in the town to Shaikh Jamál Hánsawí, and made his offerings and alms. Here a despatch arrived announcing that Muzaffar Husain Mirzá, after flying from Gujarát, had been taken prisener by Rájá 'Alí Khán, the ruler of Asír and Burhánpúr. On the 1st Zí-l ka'da the camp moved for the Panjáb, and a farmán was sent to Rájá 'Alí Khán, directing him to send Muzaffar Husain Mirzá with his (the Rájá's) sen to Court.

Twenty-fourth year of the Reign.

The beginning of this year corresponded with Thursday, 18th Muharram, 9873 H. (12th March, 1579) * * * [Hunting, etc.]

The Emperor marched to the town of Bahíra, and here intelligence was brought of the approach of Her Highness Maryam Makání from the capital, and Prince Salím was sent to meet her. * * After conferring the government of the Panjáb on Sa'íd Khán, the Emperor started on his return homewards, and on reaching the village of Sultánpár, appertaining to Khizrábád, he ordered beats to be cellected, so that the rest of the journey might be performed by water. Muhammad Kásim Khán, the Mir-bahr, cellected the vessels, and on the 3rd Jumáda-s sání, 986 m., the Emperor embarked. The camp returned by land. He reached Dehlí, and the boats were meered opposite the temb of Khwája Khizr on the 29th of the menth. This being the time of the 'ars, or anniversary of Khwája Mu'ínu-d dín, he left the boats on the 1st Rajab, and set off. Travelling thirty kos a day, he reached Ajmír on the evening of the 6th, which was the day of the festival, and paid his visit to the tomb. Next day he started for Fathpúr, and travelling fifty kes a day, he arrived there on the evening of the 9th.\(^1\) There he spent much of his time in the building called the \(^1\)Ibádat-khána, in the company of learned and hely men, every one of whom he enriched with gifts of gold and silver. Every Friday he used to pass the night there, making offerings and dispensing charity.

In those days there was a reservoir in the court-yard of the palace at Fathpur, twenty gaz long by twenty broad and three gaz deep. This he caused to be filled with red, white, and black money (i.e. gold, silver, and copper), the whole of which he gave away to the amirs, the poor, the holy, and the learned. The total of this money amounted to twenty krors of tankas,² and the distribution of it lasted for three years.

In this year Ma'súm Khán, Koka of Mirzá Hakím, a young man of courage, who had done some great things, being offended with the Mirzá, left him and came to the Court of the Emperor, who received him with great kindness. Ho gavo him a mansab of 500, and a jágir in Bihár, whither he sent him. When Ma'súm went there, Kálá Pahár, one of the highest and bravest of the Afghán amirs, attacked him; but he was victorious, although he received several wounds. The Emperor bestowed upon him as a recognition a mansab of 1000, with a horse and a robe.

In the month of Shawwal he appointed Mulla Taiyib to the divant of the province of Bihar and Hajipur, Purkhettam to be bakhshi, Mulla Majdi amin, and the eunuch Shamshir Khan to the charge of the khalisa of that province. In the same month

Maksúd Jauharí, who went to fetch Mirzá Muzaffar Husain from Rájá 'Alí Khán of Ásír, arrived at Court with the Mirzá and the Rájá's tribute, and presented it to His Majesty.

Campaign against Ráná Kíká.

His Majesty's mind was always intent upon clearing the land of Hindústán from the troubles and disturbances created by infidels and evil men. He sent Shahbáz Khán Mir-bakhshi * * and several other amirs, against Ráná Kíká, to ravage and occupy his country. Shahbáz Khán accordingly laid the country waste, and pursued the Ráná into the mountains and jungles. Upon reaching the fort of Kombalmír, Shahbáz Khán laid siege to it, and captured it in a few days. The Ráná made his escape from the fort by night.

Sultán Khwája, whom His Majesty had appointed Mir-i háj, now returned from Mecca, and waited upon him with presents—fabrics and stuffs of Turkey and of Europe, Arab horses, Abyssinian slaves, holy relics, and curiosities. These His Majesty accepted with much satisfaction, and he raised Sultán Khwája to the mansab of Sadr (chief judge). As it had been determined to send a leader of the pilgrims every year, Khwája Muhammad Yahya * * was now appointed, and he received four lacs of rupees for expenses.

At the end of this year, 987, intelligence arrived of the death of Khán-jahán, the ruler of Bengal. His Majesty was much grieved, and sent a letter of condolence to Isma'il Khán, the brother of the deceased. Muzaffar Khán, who had been appointed diwán, was promoted to be governor of Bengal, Rizwi Khán to be bakhshi, and Hakím Abú-l Fath and Patar Dás to discharge jointly the office of diwán.

Twenty-fifth year of the Reign.

The beginning of this year corresponded with Thursday, the 24th Muharram, 988 n.1 (12th March, 1580).

¹ The author has now got the date correct.

The rulers of Kashmir had always been well-wishers and servants of the Imperial house. His Majesty now intended, after performing his usual pilgrimage to Ajmir, to pay a visit to the tomb of Shaikh Farid Shakar-ganj, and to visit the Panjáb. So he sent Mullá Ishki, one of the old servants of the Court, along with Kazi Sadru-d dín, to Kashmir. 'Ali Khán, the ruler of Kashmir, entertained them nobly and respectfully, and exhibited his fidelity and devotion. Along with the two envoys he sent his own cakil, Muhammad Kásim, to carry his tribute and productions of Kashmir as presents to the Emperor—saffron, musk, paper, shawls, etc. They accordingly brought them to His Majesty, and roported what they had seen and knew of 'Ali Khan's cordiality and good wishes.

Muzaffar Husain Mirzá, whom Maksúd Jauharí had brought from Rájá 'Alí Khán, was pardoned through His Majesty's elemency, and released from prison.

One day, when His Majesty was taking his dinner, it occurred to his mind that probably the eyes of some hungry one had fallen upon the food; how, therefore, could he cat it while the hungry were debarred from it? Ho therefore gave orders that every day some hungry persons should be fed with some of the food prepared for himself, and that afterwards he should be served.

Hakím 'Alí was now sent to Bíjagarh along with the envoys of 'Adil Khán Dakhiní. The rulers of the Dakhin, evory one of them severally, had been accustomed to send their envoys every year with tribute and presents to the Imperial Court. When Khwája 'Abdu-lla brought presents and elephants from 'Adíl Khán, the ambassador, and his son Sháhí Beg were presented with robes, one hundred Akbar-sháhí ashrafis, one thousand five hundred and one rupees, and twenty-four tankas.

Mír Nizám, husband of the sister of Mirzá Sháh Rukh, the ruler of Badakhshán, came on a mission to the Imperial Court, bringing Turkí horses bred in Badakhshán, fine rubies, several camels, and other gifts.

The Emperor used to keep every year the anniversary of the Prophet's birth. This year he kept it on the 12th Rabí'u-l awwal, and he gave a great entertainment, at which the saiyids, learned men, shaikhs, and amirs attended. Open table was kept, and no one in the city was debarred from partaking of the refreshments. On this occasion it was represented to him that the Prophet and the four lawful Khalífas¹ used themselves to preach. The 'Abbáside Khalífas also observed this tradition, and themselves used to speak.² Sultáns such as Sáhib Kirán Amír Tímúr and Mirzá Ulugh Beg used to follow the examples thus set them. His Majesty therefore felt it to be his duty to carry into practice on some Friday the custom observed by the Khalífas and Imáms. On Friday, 1st Jumáda-l awwal, he went into the Masjid-i jáma' of Fathpúr, and mounting the pulpit, he opened his speech with these lines:

The Lord who gave me empire,
Gave me a wise heart and a strong arm,
Guided me in the way of justice and equity,
And drove all but justice from my thoughts.
His praise surpasses understanding!
Great is His power—Great is God!

To these eloquent lines he briefly added some verses of the Kurán, expressing thanks for mercies and favours; then he repeated the fátiha, and came down from the pulpit and said his prayers.

Muzaffar Khán, since his appointment to the government of Bengal, had not sent a single article of the productions of the country, or any portion of its revenue, to the Imperial treasury; but he now sent five lacs of rupees in cash, various goods and articles of the country, and elephants and rarities of great value, which were graciously accepted. Muhammad Ma'súm Kábulí . also sent thirty-nine elephants as tribute.

^{2 &}quot;Khutba mi khwdndand." This, however, is not the technical Khutba, but simply a speech.

On a Friday in this month notice was given for all the poor and needy to assemble on the chaugán ground. Sultán Khwája Kalíj Khán distributed the alms to them one by one. Nearly a lac of persons assembled, and there was such a crowd and crush that eighty weak women and children were trampled to death. When the Emperor was informed of this, he ordered that for the future the people should come a few at a time, and not make a crowd.

Kutbu-d dín Atka, a nobleman of high rank, was now appointed tutor to Prince Salím. In celebration of this appointment he gave a grand feast, and the young prince honoured him with his presence. There was a grand assemblage, and Kutbu-d dín made many offerings of elephants and Arab horses, jewels and cloths. According to the usual custom, Kutbu-d dín Muhammad Atka carried the prince upon his back, and raised his aspiring head to the pinnacle of grandeur. He made presents of money and jewels to the prince, and the clamour of congratulations reached the sky.

'Abdu-lla Khán Uzbek, ruler of Máwaráu-n nahr, had always kept up a friendly intercourse and community of feeling, and used to send his envoys to the Imperial Court. His Majesty now sent Mirzá Fulád with Khwája Khatíb, a native of Bukhárá, as his envoys to 'Abdu-lla Khán, bearing a letter ' full of kind words, and a great variety of presents. [A legal discussion. The usual journey to Ajmir.] On the 21st Shawwál he returned to Fathpúr. Militar Sa'ádat, whose title is Peshrau Khán, and who had been sent on an embassy to Nizámu-l Mulk Dakhiní, now returned with the Dakhiní envoys, who brought with them elephants and other tribute.

and the zakát¹ (customs) throughout the empire. Farmáns enforcing this abolition were issued. These taxes amounted to as much as the whole revenue of Irán, and it is clear that no king would have remitted them without divine guidance.² In this year Muhammad Ma'súm Khán, son of Mu'inu-d dín Ahmad Khán Farankhúdí, who held the government of Jaunpúr, came to Court, and was allowed to return to that place. Mullá Muhammad Yazdí was appointed chief kúzí of Jaunpúr. The government of Dehlí was given to Muhibb 'Alí Khán, son of Mír Khalífa.

Affairs of Bengal.

Muzaffar Khán, on arriving in Bengal, set about arranging the affairs of that province. But his prosperity was on the wane, and his day was gone by. He was harsh in his measures, he offended men with his words, he deprived many amirs of their jágirs, he demanded the dágh (brand-tax), and brought old practices up again.

Bábá Khán Kákshál, although he was conciliatory, and begged that his jágír might be left undisturbed, was called upon for the dágh, and received no attention. The pargana of Jalesar, which was the jágír of Kháldí Khán, was taken away from him at the beginning of the spring harvest, and was added as tankhváh to the jágír of Sháh Jamálu-d dín Husain. A sum of money due from the spring harvest had been received by Kháldí Khán, and to recover this Muzaffar Khán put him in prison, and ordered him to be scourged and bastinadoed.

At this time a farmán arrived from the Imperial Court, directing Muzaffar Khán to apprehend and put to death a servant of Mirzá Muhammad Hakím named Roshan Beg, who had left Kábul and gone into Bengal, and to send his head to Court. This Roshan Beg was among the Káksháls, and Muzaffar Beg issued an order for his execution. He also spake some harsh words about Bábá Khán Kákshál. The soldiers who were present, and especially Bábá Khán and the Káksháls, trembled together, and resolved upon mutiny. They shaved their heads, put on their high caps, and broke out into revolt. Crossing the river, they went to the city of Gaur, celebrated in old times under the name of Lakhnautí. There they collected men, and having found property of Muzaffar Khán in several places, they took it or destroyed it. Muzaffar Khán collected boats, and sent Hakím Abú-l Fath and Patar Dás, with an army against them on the banks of the river.

When the disaffection of the Káksháls was reported to the Emperor, he sent a farmán to Muzaffar Khán, in which he said that the Káksháls had long been servants of the throne, and that it was not right to hurt them; they were therefore to be conciliated and encouraged with hopes of the Emperor's favour, and the matter of their jágirs was to be settled. The farmán arrived at the time when Muzaffar Khán was in face of the insurgents.

Upon the arrival of the farmán, Bábá Khán and the other rebels made a show of submission, and sent a message to Muzaffar Khán, asking him to sond Rizwí Khán and Patar Dás to arrange terms with them, and to set their minds at ease. He accordingly sent Rizwí Khán, Mír Abú Ishák, son of Mír Rafi'u-d dín and Ráí Patar Dás. Bábá Khán put all three of them in confinement, and so stirred the fire of warfare.

Coincident with this, it so happened that Mullá Taiyib, Purkhottam Bakhshi, and the revenue officials of Bihár, also entered upon harsh dealings. They took away the jágirs of Muhammad Ma'súm Kábulí, 'Arab Bahádur, and all the amirs, and so laid the foundation of an evil system. Ma'súm Kábulí, who after this insurrection obtained the cognomen of 'Así, having leagued with 'Arab Bahádur and Sufaid Badakhshí, resolved to rebel, and kill Mullá Taiyib and Ráí Purkhottam. Having put them to flight, they plundered their dwellings. After a few days, Purkhottam rallied some loyal subjects, and crossed the river Jausa with the intention of attacking the rebels. But the rebel 'Arab Bahádur anticipated him, took him unawares, and killed him.

Upon intelligence of 'Así Ma'súm's rebellion reaching Bábá Khán Kákshál, a correspondence was opened between them, and when the Káksháls confronted Muzaffar Khán, 'Así marched to assist them, and arrived at Garhí. Muzaffar Khán then sent Khwája Shamsu-d dín Muhammad Khwáfi with a detachment and some guns to the passes of Garhí, to arrest the progress of 'Así Ma'súm. But the latter had a strong force; he broke through Garhí, and attached the Khwája and defeated him. He then formed a junction with the Káksháls, and the revolt gathered strength.

The Káksháls then crossed the river, and advanced against Muzaffar Khán. Wazír Jamíl, one of the old amirs of the State, along with Ján Muhammad Bihbúdí and some others, deserted Muzaffar Khán, and joined the insurgents. Muzaffar Khán then took shelter in the fort of Tánda, which was nothing better than four walls. The rebels occupied the town of Tánda. They took Hakím Abú-l Fath, Khwaja Shamsu-d dín and others prisoners, and began to pillage. Hakím Abú-l Fath with the Khwája and Ráí Patar Dás effected their escape by artifice, and fled on foot. By the help of the samindars, they managed to reach Hájípúr. The rebels made themselves masters of the fort of Tánda, brought Muzasfar Khán out of his house upon a solemn assurance (of safety), and put him to death. They took possession of his property and effects, and all the country of Bengal and Bihar fell into their hands. Nearly 30,000 horsemen assembled round the rebels. The Emperor some time before this had taken Mirzá Sharafu-d dín Husain out of prison, and sent him to Bengal to Muzassar Khán. The rebels now released him from confinement, and placed him at their head. So the revolt increased.

Upon the facts being communicated to the Emperor, he sent Rájá Todar Mal * * and other amirs to repress it. Farmáns were sent to Muhammad Ma'súm Farankhúdí, governor of Jaunpúr, and Samánjí Khán and the jágirdárs of that country, directing them to place themselves under the command of Todar Mal, and render every assistance to quash the rebellion.

While the Imperial army was on the march, Shaham Khan Jalair fought with Saiyid Badakhshi and killed him. When the army reached Jaunpur, Muhammad Ma'sum joined Todar Mal with 3000 horsemen fully armed, and marched on with him. But Muhammad Ma'sum was a weak-minded man, his dignity and the strength of his army had turned his brain, and he began to show many little actions savouring of disaffection, and to utter expressions indicative of disloyalty. Raja Todar Mal, like a prudent and experienced man, temporized with him, and did all he could to reassure and conciliate him.

When the Imperial army reached Mongir, 'Asi Kabuli and the Kakshals, and Mirza Sharafu-d din Husain with 30,000 horse, and 500 elephants, and with war-boats and artillery, in battle order, advanced to meet the Imperial army. Raja Todar Mal had no confidence in the (cohesion of the) adventurers composing the enemy's army, and deeming it inexpedient to fight, he occupied the fort of Mongir, and throwing up other fortifications around it, he kept that position. Every day combats occurred between the men of the outposts. When these proceedings were reported to the Emperor, he on one occasion sent Zainu-d din Kambú by dâk-chauki with a lac of rupees for the expenditure of the army. Some days after, he sent the same amount by the hands of Darya Khan âb-dâr, and so on by different persons. At different times he sent a great deal of money.

At this time Huméyún Farmúli and Tarkhén Diwána deserted the Imperial army and joined the insurgents. For four months the loyal forces and the insurgents faced each other, but at length some loyal samindars of the vicinity cut off the supplies from the insurgents, and great scarcity provailed among thom. Bábá Khán Kákshál foll sick at Tánda and died. Jabbárí, son of Majnún Khán Kákshál, who was the main prop of the rabble, being informed of the sinking condition of Baba Khan, wanted to go to Tánda. 'Así [Ma'súm], not being able to maintain his ground, withdrew to Bihar. 'Arab Bahadur made a rapid march to Patna, seized upon the city, and appropriated the treasure. Bihár Khán Khássa-khail went into the fort of Patna, and held ont. Rájá Todar Mal and his supporters sent Muhammad Ma'súm Farankhúdí with a detachment to the relief of Patna. On hearing of his approach, 'Arab Bahádur raised the siege, and went off towards Gajpatí, one of the chief samindars of that country.

The Rájá and Sádik Khán and * * * and the other amirs marched to Bihár after 'Así Ma'súm, who sought an opportunity to make a night attack upon Sádik Khán's camp. But Sádik Khán was a wary commander, and on that night he and his men were prepared. Ján Beg and Ulúgh Khán Habshí were in command of his advanced force, and the enemy attacking them unawares, Ján Beg was killed and Ulúgh Khán fell back. Sádik Khán had to resist a sharp attack, but the Emperor's good fortnne aided him, and he defeated Ma'súm, who went off to Bengal in sorry plight. Now, Garhí fell into the hands of the royal troops.

Among the strange occurrences of the time was this: A letter was sent by the hands of Hasan tauacht-basht to Shuja'at Khan, ruler of Malwa, summoning him to Court. Accordingly, he and his son Kiyam Khan set off from Sarangpur to attend upon His Majesty. His attendants were seized with the desire to rebel, so they killed both him and his son, and then dispersed, each one taking his own way. When the Emperor heard this, he sent Sharif Khim Atka to be governor of Malwa, and called the young surviving children of Shuja'at Khim to Conrt.

In consequence of the state of affairs in Bengal, 'Azam Khán who had been living for some time in retirement at Ágra, was again received into favour, and he was sent with 5000 horse to assume the government of Bihár.\(^1\) For greater security, Sháh-báz Khán Kambú, who was engaged against Ráná Kíká, and had nearly driven the Ráná from the country, was summoned and sent with an army to the support of the forces in Bengal. When Sháhbáz Khán came near to Hájipúr, where 'Arab Bahádur had taken refnge with Rájá Gajpatí, he marched to attack him. For one month he carried on operations against him, clearing away the jungle, until at length he drove off 'Arab Bahádur, and made the Rájá snecumb.

[The Emperor pays a visit to Sharif Khan Atka. Hakimu-l Mulk Gilani appointed "Leader of the Pilgrimage."]

A despatch now arrived from Rájá Todar Mal, stating that he had kept Muhammad Ma'súm Farankhúdí along with him by conciliatory treatment and all kinds of expedients. That Khwája Mansúr [the diwān] had written sharp letters to him, claiming a good deal of money due from him. He [the diwān] had also written letters to Tarsún Muhammad Khán, one of the great amirs and commander of an army, holding out threats to him, at a time when enconragement was necessary. The sharp practice of the diwān having been repeatedly mentioned to His Majesty, he removed him from office, and placed him in charge of Sháh Kulí Khán. An order was promulgated appointing Wazír Khán to be diwān in chief instead of him, and Kází 'Alí, son of Kutbu-d din Baghdádí, was to assist him in deciding important questions.

A great natural curiosity was brought to the notice of the Emperor at this time. It was a man born without ears or any orifice of the ears, who yet heard all that was spoken, just like people with ears. His Majesty was greatly interested in the man, and settled a pension upon him.

[Prince Daniyal makes the usual pilgrimage to Ajmir instead of the Emperor.]

Rájá Todar Mal, Tarsún Muhammad Khán, and the other amirs took up their quarters in Hájípúr during the rainy season, and Ma'súm Farankhúdí, with their permission, went to Jaunpúr, which was his jágir. There he began to show signs of disaffection. His Majesty therefore sent Peshrau Khán, dárogha of the farásh-khána, to set him at ease; he also gave him the country of Oudh instead of Jaunpúr, and bestowed the latter upon Tarsún Khán. Ma'súm spoke dutiful words to Peshrau Khán, and did net show his disaffection; but as Oudh was near, he went there.

Niyábat Khán, son of Háshim Khán Naishapúrí, who had grown up in the nurture of the Imperial Court, broke out in rebellion in his jágir of Jausa and Payág (Allahábád), and attacked the fort of Karra, which was the jágir of Isma'íl Kulí Khán. Ilyás Khán, who was shikhdár of that place for Isma'íl Kulí, fought with him and was killed. Ho then invested the fort of Garha, and began to pillage. This being reported to His Majesty, he sent Ismá'íl Kulí Khán, * * and several other amirs to ropress him. He also sent Rájá Birbal and Sháh Kulí Khán Mahram to oxeite the hopes of Ma'súm Khán Farankhúdí, and bring him to Conrt.

When Wazir Khán had departed, Khwája Mansúr was released from confinement, and again appointed to the office of diwan.

As soon as Niyábat heard of the approach of the royal army, he raised the siege of Karra, and went towards Kantal, one of the dependencies of Patna. The amirs followed him, crossed over the river, and came up with him. Niyábat Khán attacked them, and a hard fight ensued, but at last he was defeated and went off to Ma'sám Khán.

At this time, also, 'Arab Bahádur fled before Sháhbáz Khán, and took refuge with Ma'súm.¹ Sháhbáz Khán, in pursuit of him, went to Jannpúr, and from thence to Oudh against Ma'súm. But Ma'súm advanced to meet him, defeated him, and put him to flight. In one day Sháhbáz Khán travelled forty kos to Jaunpúr. Tarsún Muhammad Khán, who commanded the right wing of Sháhbáz Khán's force, had been hidden by the jungle, and when Ma'súm's army was disordered, this force came up and defeated it. When Sháhbáz Khán was informed of this, he returned immediately, joined his right wing, and rallying his forces, pursued the enemy. Ma'súm fought again in the vicinity of the city of Oudh, and was again defeated. His mother and sisters, wives and children, property and troops were taken. He himself fled to the Siwálik hills. This happened in the month of Zí-l hijja, in the year 988° 11.

Twenty-seventh year of the Reign.

The beginning of this year corresponded with Sunday, 15th Safar, 989.3

In the beginning of this year intelligence arrived that Mirzá Mnhammad Hakím, allured by the inducements held out in letters sent to him by 'Ksí Ma'súm Kábulí and Ma'súm Farankhúdí, and urged on by his maternal uncle Farídún, had set out from Kábul with the object of conquering Hindústán. He sent his servant Shádmán over the Indus (in advance), but Kunwar Mán Singh, son of Rájá Bhagwán Dás, attacked him and killed him.⁴ On hearing of this, the Mirzá crossed the river, and encamped in the pargana of Saiyidpúr.

The Emperor assembled his forces, and having advanced to all the soldiers eight months' pay out of the treasury, he marched towards the Panjáb. Prince Dániyál remained at Fathpúr, and

Should be 989.

This should be 990 (11th March 1884)

A force sent in advance of this had been defeated by Mirzi Ism Isman governor of the Panjah.—Akhar-nama, vol. iii. p. 210.

Sultán Khwája and Shaikh Ibráhím were there left in charge of affairs. Upon the Emperor's reaching the sarái of Bád, fifteen kos from Fathpúr, he received intolligence of the victory of Sháhbáz Khán over Ma'súm Farankhúdí. Deeming this an auspicious omen, he continued his march.

When Kunwar Mán Singh defeated Shádmán, he obtained from Shádmán's portfolio three letters from Mirzá Muhammad Hakím: one to Hakímu-l Mulk, one to Khwája Sháh Mansúr, and one to Muhammad Kásim Khán Mir-bahr; all in answer to letters of invitation and encouragement. Kunwar Mán Singh sent these letters to the Emperor, who ascertained the contents, but kept the fact concealed.

After the Emperor marched from Dehlí, Mirzá Muhammad Makim advanced to Lahore, and encamped in the garden of Mahdi Kásim Khán. Kunwar Mán Singh, Sa'id Khán, and Rájá Bhagwán Dás had gone into the fortress. On the Emperor's reaching Pánipat, Malik Sání Kábulí, diwán of Mirzá Muhammad Hakím, who had the title of Wazír Khán, deserted the Mirza, and came to the Imperial camp. He alighted at the tent of Khwaja Shah Mansur, and made him the channel for offering his services to the Emperor. When Khwája Sháh Mansur announced his arrival, the Emperor's suspicions were aroused, and he thought that the diván's arriving at the time when his master was invading Hindústán must have some policy in it. He was already suspicious of Mansúr, and his doubts were now confirmed. So he dismissed Mansúr, and showed him the Mirzá's letters. Mansúr asseverated (his innocence), but it was of no use.

The Emperor proceeded to Sháhábád, and Malik 'Alí brought him a letter to the following effect: "When my sconts were coming from the ford of Ludíana, which is under my charge, and reached the sarai of Sirhind, they found a footman with swollen feet. This footman said to them, 'I belong to Sharaf Beg, the servant of Khwaja Sháh Mansúr. He is the Khwaja's shikkdár in his jágir of Fírozpúr, thirty kos from Lahore. These letters are to be delivered to the Khwaja; as my feet are in a bad state, do you convey the letters quickly to him.' These letters my men have brought to me." When the secretary opened them, one was a letter from Sharaf Beg to Khwaja Mansúr, about the affairs of Fírozpúr, and the other was a letter from one person to another person, and of the following purport: "I met Farídún Khán, and he carried me to wait upon Muhammad Hakim Bádsháh. Although he had sent his revenue collectors into all the parganas of this quarter, he has not sent any to ours, but has held us exempt." On hearing and considering these letters, it appeared to His Majesty that Sharaf Beg had written one of them to Khwaja Mansur, and that the other was certainly connected with the coming of Mirzá Muhammad Hakím's diwán, Malik Sání, to Khwája Mansúr. (Many of the amirs and officers of State were on bad terms with the Khwaja, and these exerted their influence to secure his death. So the Emperor gave the order for his execution, and he was hanged next morning.)

Three days afterwards, intelligence came in that Mirzá Muhammad Hakím, having been informed of the Emperor's march towards the Panjáb, had passed the river of Lahore, and gone off to Kábul. The Emperor advanced from Sirhind to Kalánor, and from thence to New Rohtás. There he received good news, and hunting as he went along, he reached the Indus. In the month of Rabí'u-s sání, he ordered a fort to be built on the banks of the Indus, which is called Sind-ságar, and he called it Atak Banáras. Boats were scarce, so he ordered the amirs and soldiers to search for and produce some. He assigned their respective posts to the various amirs. Kunwar Mán Singh, with Shaikh Jamál Bakhtiyár and Mádhú Singh his brother * * and others were sent over the river towards Parshor (Pesháwar). When they took possession of that city, the Emperor sent Prince

According to Abu-l Fazl, he paid a visit to Nagarkot before reaching Kalanor. — Akbar-nama, vol iii. p. 326.

Murad along with Kalij Khan, Rai Singh, Mirza Yusuf, and other amirs, to effect the conquest of Kabul.

At this timo Khwája Abú-l Fazl and * * camo as onvoys from Mirzá Muhammad Hakím, to beg pardon for his offences. The Emperor sent Hájí Habíbu-lla along with thom to Kábul, promising him forgiveness, on condition that he repented of the past, would bind himself by oath (for the future), and would send his sister to the Imperial Court. Prince Murád passed through the Khaibar Pass, and on the 15th Jumáda-s sání, the Emperor crossed over the river Sind-ságar (Indus), and there encamped.

Here he sent the least of his servants, Nizámu-d dín Ahmad, the anthor of this work, to proceed rapidly in advance of Prince Murád, and open communications with the amirs who had gone on first, and to ascertain whether they could get to Kábul without the Emperor, or if they needed his presence; by what road he ought to proceed; and whether he should come with all his army or travel express (jarida). In one night and day I reached Jalálábád, a distance of seventy-five kos, and delivered my message to the Prince. He was determined upon proceeding to Kábul, and thought it advisable to send me back specdily to the Emperor. Ho also sent along with me Hájí Habíbu-lla, who had come from Kábul to Jalálábád, and I was to report that Mirzá Muhammad Hakím was sincerely repentant of the past, that he had taken oaths, and that he was willing to send his sister, but that Khwája Husain, her husband, had carried her off to Badakhshán. When I and Hájí Habíbu-lla joined His Majesty, he on the following day marched to Pershor (Pesháwar). There he left Princo Salím in camp with Rájá Bhagwan Das, Sa'id Khan [etc.], and went on with speed, travelling about twenty kos a day. When Prince Murád camo to within seven kos of Kabul, Mirza Muhammad Hakim issued forth to the village of Khurd-kabul, and attacked him; but he was defeated and put to flight. The victorious Prince then entered Kábul,

On the night before this action Faridán, the uncle of Mirzá Hakím, attacked the rear of the Prince's army, killed a good many men, and carried off considerable spoil. This day the Emperor advanced and encamped at Surkháb, fifteen kos from the army of the Prince. When the rear of the Prince's army was attacked and plundered, it so happened that Hájí Muhammad Ahadí, who had gone on in advance as messenger (dák-chaukí) to the Prince, arrived upon the spot, and beheld the rout. He turned back and reported the disaster, which annoyed the Emperor. But notwithstanding this news, next day the Emperor went on a stage, and then received accounts of the victory that had been gained, and for which he offered up his thanksgiving.

On Friday, 10th Rajáb, he entered Kábul, and remained there for twenty days visiting the gardens. Here he was informed that Mirzá Muhammad Hakím intended to abandon his country, and take refuge with the Uzbeks. Deeming this a disgrace and shame, he sent Latíf Khwája to Mirzá Muhammad Hakím, who was at Ghorband, to tell him that his offences were forgiven. The Mirzá, having in the presence of Latíf Khwája made a promise and a vow of fidelity, executed an engagement, and sent it by 'Alí Muhammad Asp along with Latíf Khwája to the Emperor.

His Majesty then turned homewards to Hindústán, after conferring Kábul upon Mirzá Muhammad Hakím. Leaving the army, he went on quickly to Jalálábád, where there was a large encampment. Prince Salím, and the nobles who were with him, hastened forth to meet His Majesty, and to congratulate him on his victory. Khwájagí Muhammad Husain, the brother of Kásim Khán Mír-bahr, who was one of Mirzá Muhammad Hakím's nobles, came to proffer his services to the Emperor, and was admitted among the number of his friends.

From Jalálábád he sent a detachment to attack the hills of the Kator infidels. Travelling by regular stages, he reached the banks of the Sind-ságar (Indus). Muhammad Kásim Khán; who had been left behind to make a bridge, had constructed one of beats. The journey to Kábul had been performed in one month. In one day he [and his escort] crossed the river and went on to Láhoro, where he arrived on the last day of Ramazán. He again ontrusted the government of the Panjáb to Sa'íd Khán, Rájá Bhagwán Dás, and Kunwar Mán Singh, and went on his way hunting to Fathpúr. At Pánipat Sháhbáz Khán came to wait upon him. On the 25th Shawwál he arrived at Dehlí. Prince Dániyál and the amtrs who had remained at Fathpúr, and Her Highness Maryam Makání came forth to meet him, and on the 5th Zí-l ka'da he arrived thoro.

While the Emperor was engaged in the Kábul eampaign, Bahádur 'Alí, son of Saiyid Badakhshí entered the country of Tirhút, and gave himself the title of Bahádur Sháh;¹ but he was taken prisoner and killed by the men of Khán-i 'azam. Ma'súm Khán Farankhúdí, being in great distress and anxiety in the Siwálik hills, begged forgiveness for his offenees through Khán-i 'azam; and in consequence of the Khán's intercession he was pardened. Then he waited upon Khán-i 'azam in humble guise, and was afterwards admitted to an interview with the Emperor at Fathpúr.²

(When the Emperor was waited upon at Kabul by the confidential servants of Mirza Muhammad Hakim, he made inquiry into the case of Khwaja Shah Mansur, and it appeared that Karmu-lla, brother of Shahbaz, had colluded with others to concoet letters, and that he had forged the last letter on the evidence of which Khwaja Mansur was executed.) After this was discovered, the Emperor often regretted the execution of the Khwaja. He now remained for some time at Fathpur, ¹ According to Badauni (vol. ii. p. 298), he caused the khutba to be read and coins to be struck in his name.

² He was soen afterwards murdered, as ho was returning home from the palace. Niyabat was also "pardoned for the sake of his uncle Shahabu-d din Ahmad Khan, ruler of Malwa; but he was sent to the fort of Rantambhor, and confined. There he was guilty of things which cannot be mentioned, and stirred up a great mutiny among the prisoners: se in 998 he was condemned and executed."—Badaani, vol. ii. p. 299.

administering justice, dispensing charity, and arranging public business.

On the 19th Muharram, 990 H., Khán-i 'azam, governor of Hájípúr and Patna, came to wait upon the Emperor, and to give an account of the affairs of Bengal. After staying several days, he was sent back to Bengal, and several nobles and soldiers who had been to Kábul were sent with him.

Twenty-eighth year of the Reign.

The beginning of this year corresponded with Tuesday, 27th Safar, 991 (11th March, 1583 A.D.).

[A festival of eighteen days' duration at the Nau-ros.]

Sháham Khán Jalesar from Bengal, and Rájá Bhagwán Dás from Lahore, came to wait upon His Majesty. It has been mentioned in a previous page how Khán-i 'azam came with a number of jágirdárs from Bengal to wait upon the Emperor, leaving the súba empty. Evil-minded men took advantage of their absence, and coming out of every corner began to excite disturbances. A servant of Ma'súm Kábulí, by name Khabíta, in concert with Tarkhán Díwána and Surkh Badakhshí, raised commotions in Bihár. Muhammad Sádik Khán, with Muhibb 'Alí Khán, defeated him and killed him.

[Return of Gulbadan Begam and Salima Sultan Begam from Mecca. Prince Salim sent to Ajmir to meet them, and to visit the shrine of Mu'inu-d din.]

Muhammad Sádik Khán came from Bihár, and was well received, but he was soon sent to assist Khán-i 'azam in suppressing the revolt of 'Así Kábulí. Sháh Kulí Khán and other amirs who had been on the Kábul campaign were sent with him. About this time Mír Abú Turáb and 'Itimád Khán, who had visited the holy temple together, came to Court, and had an interview with His Majesty. Abú Turáb had brought a stone upon which there was said to be an impression of the Prophet's foot. His Majesty went out four kos to receive this stone with every mark of honour. An order was issued that all the amirs in turn should carry it on their backs a few steps. So each one carried it a little way, and brought it into the city. [Weighing of Prince Salim against gold and silver.] The traitor, Núr Muhammad by name, was brought a prisoner from Tirhút, and suffered punishment in the market.

Ticenty-ninth year of the Reign.

Agreeing with 9912 II.

[Festival of the new year.]

The news from Bengal was, that Khán-i 'azam had occupied Tánda, that Kháldí Khán, Jabbár Burdí, and Mirzá Beg Kákshál had separated from 'Así Kábulí, and had come to Khán-i 'azam, and that 'Así had sought refuge with certain zamindairs. All the parts of Bengal that were in the possession of the rebels now came again under the authority of the Imperial officers.

As 'Itimád Khán had held the government of Gujarát for several years, he was better acquainted with the prosperous management of the country than others could be, and if the government were confirmed to him it might be the means of exciting the emulation of rulers in other countries. For this reason he was appointed governor of Gujarát. Mír Abú Turáb was appointed amin, Khwája Abú-l Kásim, brother of Mullá 'Abdu-l Kádir was appointed diván, and the humble servant Nizámu-d dín Ahmad, the author of this work, was appointed bakhshi. Muhammad Husain Shaikh and * * * were made jägir-dárs of Gujarát.

Amír Fathu-lla, one of the saiyids of Shíráz, a very wise and learned man, had gone from Shíráz to 'Adil Khán in the Dakhin, and had there held high office. On the 22nd Rabí'u-s sání he came to visit the Emperor at Fathpúr. Khán-khánán and Hakim Abú-l Fath were sent forth to meet him, and to bring him in with due honour. He was appointed to the exalted office of Sadr.

The suppression and dispersion of the rebels in Bengal was reported to the Emperor. It was known that 'Así Kábulí was in the country of 'Aisí, and Khán-i 'azam was desirous of returning home. For these reasons the Emperor ordered Sháh-báz Khán to proceed to Bengal, to allot the whole of that sarkár in jágirs to the soldiers, and to do his best to exterminate 'Así Kábulí. On the 17th Jumáda-s sání, he started to assume his duties.

In this year, an order was given for the translation into Persian of the Mahá-bhárat, which is the chief book of history of the Brahmaus. The translation was completed, and received the name of Rasm-náma (Book of War).

Information was now brought that Khán-i 'azam had sent Shaikh Farid to make peace with Katlú Afghán (in Orissa). When the Shaikh reached his dwelling, and had an interview with him, Katlú was very humble. Bahádur Gauriya, one of the samindárs of Bengal, and a high officer in the army of Katlú, came to sec the Shaikh, who then travelled on under the eyes of the samindárs and the servants of Katlú. Bahádur, in a hostile manner, blocked up the road by which the Shaikh was returning, and attacked him. Many of his men were killed, but the Shaikh escaped without injury.

Burhánu-l Mulk, brother of Murtaza Nizámu-l Mulk, ruler of the Dakhin, fled from his brother to Kutbu-d dín Khán,¹ and by command he came from thence to wait upon the Emperor in the month of Rajab. But before this, a person calling himself Burhánu-l Mulk had waited upon the Emperor, and had obtained a jágir. Now that the real man had come, and the imposture was displayed, the impostor fled and hid himself; but he was discovered after the lapse of a week among some jogis, and was cast into prison.

^{1 &}quot;In Malwa."—Badauni, vol. ii. p. 324.

An order was given to 'Itimád Khán to take away the country of Sirohi from Sarmán Deorí, and to give it to Jagmál his brother, who was an adherent of the Imperial throne: 1000 mohurs (mulrs) was sent in charge of the writer of this work towards payment of the expenses. When 'Itimad Khan arrived at Jalor, the anther, Muliammad Ma'súin Bakhari, Kambar Beg I'shang Aká, Zaiun-d dín Kambú, and Pahlawán 'Alí Sistani, who was appointed kolwal of Ahmadábád, joined Itimád Khán. Muhamınad Husain Shaikh and soveral jäytrdärs of Gujarat remained bolind. After Itimad Khan arrived at Jalor, he proceeded to Sirohi, and having removed Sarman Deori, he installed Jagmal, whom ho loft there with Aghzan Khan, Mahmud Jalori, Bijad Deora, Rái Singh, son of Chandar Sen, son of Rái Mál Doo. Then he proceeded towards Ahmadábád, and on appreaching the city, Shahabn-d din Ahmad Khan came out and posted himself in 'Usmánpúr, one of the suburbs. On the 12th Sha'ban, 'Itimad Khan wont into the city. Two days afterwards it was discovered that 'Abid Badakhshi * * and a large party of the servants of Shahábu-d dín Khán had loft him, and gonc off to Káthíwár, to invito Muzaffar Gujarátí, who was there living in the retirement to which he had been driven by the Imperial arms; their object being to promote a revolt.

'Itimád Khán thought it desirable to have a conference with Shahábn-d dín upon the subject; so he sent me, the anther of this work, to him. When I saw him, he told me that this band of conspirators had a design against his life, and that they had for a long time been preparing this plot. New that they had tern the veil from their designs, they would receive ne encouragement or help from him. When I reported the state of the case to 'Itimád Khán, he thought it expedient to conciliate the conspirators; so he sent me and two other persons to appease them. But they rejected our evertures, and continued their jenrney.

^{1 &}quot;Who had fled from the Imperial Court, and had sought refuge with his mether's relations."—Badauni, vol. ii. p. 327. Abu-l Fazl says he was really an obscure individual named Tannu, who took the name of Muzaffar, and called himself son of Sultan Mahmud of Gujarat.—Akbar-nama, vol. iii. p. 104.

Shahábu-d dín removed and went to Karí, twenty kos from Almadábád. We now sent several letters to Shahábu-d dín, urging him to delay his departure for a few days; but making no stay, he went on his way.¹

On the 27th Sha'ban, the intelligence arrived that the rebels had come to Dúlaka,² bringing with them Muzaffar and some Káthíwár people.

Kambar Beg Ishang Aká now came in from Shahábu-d dín, reporting that he had promised to stay at Karí. 'Itimád Khán, Mír Abú Turáb, and I, therefore went forth to see Shahábu-d din; to mollify him and bring him back with us. Towards the close of day, 'Itimád Khán set off for Karí. It had been urged upon him that it was not right for the ruler of a city to leave it when the enemy was at a distance of only twelve kos. But it was of no avail. He left his own son with Amír Ma'súm Bakharí and * * and my son, and started. When he and I reached Kari, we talked with Shahábu-d dín, and we reconciled him, upon our promise that the parganas which he had for a long time held in jagir should be relinquished to him; and that he should be paid a subsidy of two lacs of rupees. In fact, all he asked was conceded. Towards close of day, 'Itimád Khán and he set out from Karí, to return to Ahmadábád. On the same day that 'Itimád Khán went to Karí, Muzaffar Gujarátí came to Ahmadábád. The men of the city gave him (access to) the fort, and as part of the wall was broken down, he made his way in immediately.

At midnight, when ['Itimád Khán and] Shahábu-d dín were ten kos from Ahmadábád, they were met by Mír Ma'súm Bakharí and Zainu-d dín Kambú, who had come out of the city and brought the news. They alighted, and after consultation decided that as the enemy had gained only one day, he had had no time to strengthen himself, and that we must get into the city as he had done. So we went on to the city, and in the morning arrived at 'Usmánpúr, which is on the side of the river near the city. Muzasiar Gujarátí came forth, and drew up his forces on the sandy bank of the river. Shahábu-d dín was quite helpless, because his mon were not trustworthy, and many of them ran off. I did all I could with a few men, but without effect. My son, who had been left in the city in charge of the fort, was plundered of everything. Shahábn-d dín Ahmad Khán and 'Itimád Khán took to slight, and went to Nahrwála, better known as Pattan, forty-sivo kos from Ahmadábád. I, the author, wrote a report of the occurrences to the Emperor.

Three days afterwards Muhammad Husain Shaikh * * and other júgirdars of Gujarát came to Pattan, and having set the fort in order, prepared to hold out. Muzasiar Gujarátí gave away jägirs and titles to the leading rebels, and busied himself in collecting forces. Sher Khan Fulndi had been governor of Pattan for many years, but had (since) lived for some years in adversity in the country of Súrath. He joined Muzasfar Gujarátí, who sent him with four thousand horse towards Pattan. When Sher Khán arrived at Karí, ho sent forward his men to the town of Jútána, twenty kos from Pattan.1 I attacked them and defeated them, and left Mir Muhibbu-lla * * and a detachment of soldiers at that place. Zainu-d din Kambú was sent to Kutbu-d din, governor of Broach and Baroda, desiring him to advance from that side against Ahmadábád, so that the enemy might be attacked on two sides and overpowered. Zainu-d dín went to Kutbu-d din, and brought him to Baroda. Muzaffar was informed of his arrival there, he led a large force to attack him, and Kutbu-d din, having fought in an unsoldier-like way, was defeated, and had to take refuge in the fort of Baroda. Many of his men and officers joined Muzaffar.

Sher Khán Fuládí now advanced as far as the town of Masána,² fifteen kos from Pattan, and great consternation fell upon the garrison, so much so that they were on the point of abandoning Pattan, and going off to Jálor. I resolved at all hazards to fight, and went to encounter Sher Khán. Shahábu-d dín Ahmad Khán and 'Itimád Khán stopped in Pattan,¹ the other amirs joined me. When we reached Masána, we found that Sher Khán had drawn up his forces, and he advanced to attack us with five thousand horse, while we did not exceed two thousand. Sher Khán was defeated, and went off to Ahmadábád. Many of his men were killed, and a large booty fell into our hands. I strenuously urged that we should advance against Ahmadábád,² but the amirs who were with me would not agree.

When we reached Kari, we remained there, awaiting the arrival of the soldiers who had been sent to Pattan with the spoils of our victory. We waited twelve days, and during that time several persons were sent to Pattan to collect men. We now heard that Muzaffar Gujarátí had bombarded the fort of Baroda, and that Kutbu-d dín, having received a promise (of safe conduct), had sent Zainu-d dín Kambú out (to treat). Muzaffar, regardless of his pledge, put Zainu-d dín to death. Kutbu-d dín, although the perfidy and vow-breaking of Muzaffar were manifest, was so demented, so blinded by fate, that he trusted to the promise of that promise-breaker, and went out to him. Then, at the instigation of Tarwárí, samindár of Pipla, he was put to death. Upon hearing of this, I, and the men who were with me at Karí, returned to Pattan.

From Baroda Muzaffar went to Broach, and the officers of Kutbu-d din surrendered the fortress. He obtained there fourteen lacs of rupees which were in the royal treasury at Kambay, and had been conveyed to Broach by Khwaja 'Imadu-d din Husain.

were slain, and many men fell. While Muzaffar was engaged with Mirza Khán, I brought round my men, and fell upon his rear. Rái Durgá, also, of the left wing, under the orders of Mirzá Khán, followed to support me. Muzaffar was put to flight, and great numbers of his men were slain. Next morning Mirzá Khán entered the city, and issued a proclamation of amnesty, so that every one felt reassured. Muzaffar fled to Ma'múrábád and the banks of the Mahindari river. From thence he went to Kambay. Many of the fugitives rejoined him there, so that his force again rose to nearly ten 2 thousand men. 3

Three days after the victory, Kalij Khán arrived at Ahmadábád with the army of Málwa. Mirzá Khán and all the amirs then marched towards Kambay. On their arriving at ten kos from the place, Muzaffar went off towards Baroda. When Mirzá Khán reached the village of Básad, near Patlád, on the bank of the Mahindarí, he sent Kalij Khán and * * on in advance to overtake and attack the enemy; but this force, deterred by the difficulty and narrowness of the road, came to a halt, and Muzaffar got off to Ráj-pipla and Nádot.⁵

Mirzá Khán and his army entered Baroda on the 16th, and there rested. While he was there, intelligence arrived that Saiyid Daulat, one of the officers of Muzaffar, had entered Kambay, and overpowered the royal forces in the place. Naurang Khán 6 was sent to repress this diversion, and having driven out the insurgent, he returned. Saiyid Daulat then came back and seized the town again. Khojam Burdí, an officer of Mirzá

Khán's, marched against him from Patlád, and defeated him. Mirzá Khán marched with his army to Nádot, and Muzaffar went off into the mountains. Atálík Bahádur now deserted from the Imperial army, and joined Muzaffar. So the insurgents were again set in motion.

Mirzá Khán imprisoned Sán Bahádur Uzbek, of whom he was suspicious on account of his relations with Atálík Bahádur, and he resolved to attack the rebels. Sharif Khán and Naurang Khán were appointed to the right, Kalíj Khán and Tolak Khán to the left, Páyinda Khán and some other amirs to the advance. I was sent forward to reconnoitre, and find out the best way of attacking the enemy.

When I reached the foot of the hills, I attacked the enemy's infantry, and drove them back for a good kos to where their main force was drawn up in array. A sharp action ensued. The discharge of arrows and bullets was quite bewildering, and many men and horses on both sides were wounded. I dismounted some of my best men, and rode on with them to the mountain, and I sent some to call up Kalíj Khán. I also sent Khwája Muhammad Rafia', a man renowned for his courage. Kalij Khán came up on the left, and becoming engaged, he bore back the enemy a little. But reinforcements were brought up by the enemy, and Kalij Khán and Tolak Kkán were repulsed, and fell back a bow-shot distance. The men whom I had dismounted, while the enemy was pushing after Kalij Khan, finding the way clear, ascended the hill. When the enemy returned, they attacked us, and many men were killed. Kalij Khán had found some shelter and held his ground. I sent to Mirzá Khán for the elephant guns (hath-nal). They were brought up upon the elephants, and we discharged several guns against the spot where Muzaffar was standing. Naurang Khán now came up the mountain which covered the enemy's left, and got the command of his position. When the balls from the elephant guns fell in the midst of Muzassar's division, he sled, and great numbers of his men were taken prisoners or killed. The Imperial arms obtained a complete victory.\(^1\) Mirz\(\alpha\) Kh\(\alpha\)n returned, and came to Ahmad\(\alpha\)b\(\alpha\)d, where he busied himself in arranging the affairs of the army and the peasantry. He left Kal\(\gamma\) Kh\(\alpha\)n and * \(^n\) the other M\(\alpha\)lwa amirs to proceed against Broach. For seven months he remained in Ahmad\(\alpha\)b\(\alpha\)d, and at the end of that time the fort of Broach was captured. Charkas R\(\alpha\)mi, who had deserted Knt\(\beta\)n-d d\(\alpha\) Muhammad Kh\(\alpha\)n to join Mnzassar, and was appointed by him commandant of the fortress of Broach, was taken in the fort, and executed. Nas\(\alpha\), who was also an officer, escaped, though half-dead.

At the time when Mirzá Khán was sent to Gnjarát, His Majesty commanded a city and fort to be built at Payág, at the confluence of the Ganges and Jumna, to which the name of Illahabás was given. His Majesty went there by boat from Agra, and spent four months there pleasantly. * * When intelligence of the killing of Kutbu-d dín and the spread of the revolt in Gnjarát arrived, His Majesty started for Agra and Fathpúr, so that he might set out from the latter place to Gnjarát. On reaching Etáwa; intelligence of the victory arrived, and so he stayed at Fathpúr. He sent farmáns to the amirs in Gujarát. To Mirzá Khán he gave the title of Khán-khánán, a horse, a robe, a jewelled dagger, and the banner of 5000° (táman tágh). On me, the author, he bestowed a horse, a robe, and increased emoluments. All the officers received marks of his favour.

After his second defeat, Muzassar Gujarátí retreated by way of Champánír, Bírpúr, and Jháláwar, to the country of Súrath, 5 and rested at the town of Gondal, twelve kos1 from the fort of Júnagarh. His scattered forces gathered round him from all sides, so that he mustered nearly three thousand horse and foot. He gave a lac of Mahmúdís and a jewelled dagger to Amín Khán Ghorí, ruler of Súrath, and so won his support. He gave a similar sum to Jám Marsal,2 Rájá of Jháláwar, who was at the head of a body of troops and clansmen. He once more formed designs against Ahmadábád. A mín Khán, being cautious, said to Muzaffar, "Go to the Jám, and take him along with you. I will attend to the provisions for the army, and will follow you." When Muzaffar went to the Jam, he drew back and said, "You march and advance against Ahmadábád: I will follow." On the arrival of Muzaffar at Morbí, sixty kos from Ahmadábád, and the intelligence of his advance being brought to Khán-khánán, the Khán set off with all diligence to encounter him. When Muzaffar reached Param-gam, forty kos from Morbí, and neither the Jám nor Amín Khán arrived, he returned disheartened and distracted towards the mountains of Barda.4 Then he proceeded to Jagat, which is the extreme town of Súrath, and well known under the name of Dwarka.5

The Jám sent his vakils to Khán-khánán, to represent that he was friendly to the Imperial Government; that he had taken moncy from Muzaffar, but had not joined him, and that he was then ready to conduct the army to the place where Muzaffar was staying. Amín Khán, also, through the introduction of Mír Turáb, sent his son to wait upon Khán-khánán, and assure him of his good wishes. The Jám's men guided Khán-khánán on a rapid march into the mountains of Barda, which were plundered and ravaged. A vast quantity of booty was obtained, and many men were killed or made prisoners.

Muzaffar, with five hundred Mughal horsemen, and five hundred Káthíwár horsemen, went off towards Gujarát, and proceeded to a place called Othaniya, which is situated between the Sabarmati river and the mountain defiles, and was held by a rebellious Kol named Bhái. When Khán-khánán went away (into the mountains), he lest Mediní Rái, Khojam Bardi, * * * and others in charge of the army at Hadála, near to Dandúka,1 on the high road to Kambay. He also left Bayan Bahadur and * * * with a division at Paranti,2 four kos from Othaniya.

When Muzassar proceeded to Othaniya, Saiyid Kásim Bárha came from Pattan to Bijápúr,3 which is thirty kos from Othaníya; and the force which was at Hadála came and joined the one at Parántí. Muzassar, supported by the Kols and Grássias, and all the disaffected zamindárs of the vicinity, gave battle to the force which was at Paranti; but he was signally defeated, and his elephants and canopy fell into the hands of the victors. Many of his men were killed, and he himself escaped barefoot and lialf-dead.

While Khán-khánán was thus engaged in the mountains of Barda, it became known that the Jam was not noting honestly. His vakils were dismissed, and sent back to him. The Jam prepared to oppose us, and collected an army of twenty thousand horse4 and innumerable infantry. When Khan-khanan came to within seven kos of him, he sent an envoy to make his apologies, and he also sent his son with three large elephants and eighteen Arab horses to Khán-khánán, expressing his carnest desire to enter into a treaty, and to act in a friendly way. Khán-khánán then returne I to Ahmadábád, and five months afterwards he was summoned to the Imperial Court, whither he proceeded in all haste.

Muzassar was then in Kathiwar, and was greatly aggress with Amín Khán for having taken his money, and not having given him any help. Supported by the people of Káthíwár and the zamindárs, he collected an army, and marched against Amín Khán, who took shelter in the fort of Amartali. Intelligence of this was brought to Kalíj Khán and me, who were at Ahmadábád. Kalíj Khán remained in the city, and I went out with Saiyid Kásim Khán Bárha, Mediní Ráí and , and marched forward with all speed to Súrath.

When I reached Hadála, Muzassar, feeling unable to contend with me, raised the siege of Amín Khán, and went off towards Kach. I then sent Mír Kalíj and * * to Amín Khán, proposing that we should in concert pursue Muzassar into Káthíwár. I pushed forward and went to Morbí. Muzassar sled and crossed the Ran, which is an inlet of the sea, and took the road to Jessalmír. In some places the breadth of the water of the Ran is ten kos and twenty kos. He went into the country which they call Kach, on the other side of this water. When I reached Morbí, the Jám and Amín Khán sent their sons to me, and having entered into engagements with me, I returned towards Bíram-gám.

Intelligence now arrived of the departure of Khán-khánán from Court, and of his having gone to the neighbourhood of Sirohí, with the intention of taking Sirohí and Jálor. I, in agreement with Saiyid Kásim Khán, proceeded with my men to join him. The Rájá of Sirohí came to see Khán-khánán, and paid a sum of money as tribute. Ghazín Khán, of Jálor, also came forward. But when Khán-khánán was on his way to Court, Ghazín had shown some rudeness and signs of disaffection; he was therefore imprisoned, and possession was taken of the fort of Jálor. Khán-khánán went and took up his residence at Ahmadábád.

To return to home affairs. Twenty days after Khán-khánán arrived at Court, intelligence was brought of the death of Mirzá Muhammad Hakím, the Emperor's brother. Orders were given to Rájá. Bhagwán Dás and Kunwar Mán Singh, the governor of the Panjáb, to go and take possession of Kábul. His Majesty himself proceeded to the Panjáb.

At this timo Mír Murtaza and Khudáwand Khán, ruler of the country of Birár in the Dakhin, marched to attack Ahmadnagar.¹ They were defeated in battle by Salábat Khán, the rakil of Nizámu-l Mulk, and then came complaining to the Imperial Court. A farmán was sent to 'Azam Khán, ruler of Málwa, directing him to march against the Dakhin, and subdue Birár. Farmáns were also sent to Mír Murtaza, Khudáwand Khán, Tírandáz Khán, and other men of the Dakhin. Many of the great nobles, such as 'Abdu-l Matlab Khán, * * Ráí Durga,² Rájá Askaran,³ * * and many others, too numerous to mention, were sent with artillery, three hundred elephants, and the army of Málwa on this expedition. Mír Fathu-lla, who had received the title of 'Azdu-d daula, was sent to make arrangements in the Dakhin. Khwájagí Fathu-lla was appointed bakhshí, and Mukhtár Beg diwán of this army.

This force concentrated at Hindia, on the borders of the Dakhin. 'Azam Khán had a feud with Shahábu-d din Ahmad Khán, then ruler of Ujjain, because he suspected Shahábu-d din of having instigated the murder of his father. 'Azdu-d daula endeavoured to assuage his animosity; but 'Azam Khán was a passionate man, and insulted both Shahábu-d dín and 'Azdu-d daula. For six months the force remained inactive at Hindia, and at length matters reached such a pitch that Shahábu-d dín, being offended with 'Azam Khán, went off to his jägir of Ráisín.' Azam Khán marched to attack him, and a dire calamity was upon the point of falling upon the royal army; but 'Azdu-d daula managed to effect a reconciliation.

When Rájá 'Alí Khán, the ruler of Asír and Burhánpúr, saw these dissensions in the Imperial army, he gathered his forces and marched against 'Azdu-d daula. On his approach, 'Azdu-d daula went to him, and sought to win him over; but he did not succeed, so he retreated to Gujarát to strengthen Khán-khánán.

The above-named ('Azam Khán) went towards Birár, and plundered Elichpúr; but not being able to maintain his ground, proceeded towards Nandurbár.¹ The Dakhinís followed march by march, and 'Azam Khán, notwithstanding his great strongth, fell back bofore them, till he reached Nandurbár. He wrote letters to Khán-khánán at Ahmadábád, calling for assistance, and Khán-khánán sent me and a number of amírs, such as , on in advance, and declared his own intention of following, When I arrived at Mahmúdábád, 'Azam Khán left his army at Nandurbár, and proceeded with a few attendants to Ahmadábád. Khán-khánán came out quickly from Ahmadábád to receive him, and they met at the place where I was resting, and then returned to Ahmadábád. 'Azam Khán's sister was wife of Khán-khánán, so he went to see her, and the two Kháns resolved to proceed afterwards against the Dakhinís.

I and my associates marched against the rebels to Baroda, and Khán-khánán and 'Azam Khán followed me; but the latter went on quickly, in order to get the army at Nandarbár ready. Khán-khánán wrote to me, directing me to wait at Baroda till he arrived. When the Khán arrived, he proceeded with the army to Broach, and on reaching that place he received letters from 'Azam Khán, in which he said, that as the rainy season had begun, operations must be postponed to the following year, and then they would proceed together against the Dakhin. 'Azam Khán returned to Málwa, Rájá 'Alí Khán went with the Dakhinís to their homes, and Khán-khánán returned to Ahmadábád, where he occupied himself in matters of administration for five months.

Intelligence arrived that the Emperor was marching towards

Kábul, and had arrived at Atak-Banáras, intent upon effecting the conquest of Badaklıshán. Khán-khánán wrote a letter soliciting the honour of being allowed to serve under him, and the Emperor sent a farmán, summoning him to his presence. Kalíj Khán, Naurang Khán, and myself were confirmed in our commands in Gujarát. Khán-khánán and 'Azdu-d daula, who had come up from 'Azam Khán, went off to join the Emperor.²

Just as Khán-khánán started, the news was brought in that the men of Khangár, as allies of Muzaffar Gujarátí, had attacked and killed Ráí Singh, the samindár of Jháláwar. This Ráí Singh was son of Ráí Mán, Rájá of Jháláwar; and when he succeeded his father, he attacked the neighbouring samindárs, such as the Jám, Khangár, and others, and subdued them. His name is celebrated in song and story, in the towns of Gujarát, for the courage he displayed, and he had a great renown.

A feud arose between Ráyat and Sáyat, the nephews of the chief of Khangár, and severe fighting occurred, in which Sáyat was killed, and many men on both sides perished. Ráí Singh also was wounded, and was left upon the field. Next day some jogis found him, tended him, cured him, and carried him with them to Bengal. He passed two years with them in the guise of a jogi. When Khán-khánán marched against Muzaffar Gujarátí, he came to the Khán, and told him his story. The Khán sent him to Jháláwar to be recognized by his people. He related the facts to them, and adduced his proofs, on which they acknowledged him, and reinstated him. He attacked the people of Káthíwár, and plundered several of the tribes, and he also began to assail the country of the Jám and of Khangár. He mastered and took possession of the town of Halwad, one of the dependencies of Jháláwar. The people of that neighbourhood, who had long been at enmity with him, assembled in force to attack him. The intelligence of their rising was brought to him while he was in the chaugán ground. He immediately started to meet them, and came up to them in a moonlight night. They sent a person to him to say that if he were really Ráí Singh he would not attack them by night. He magnanimously assented to their wish, and rested where he was, and went to sleep. His opponents here found their opportunity, and encouraging their followers they drow near to him, and when morning broke their whole party fell upon him. He and eighty men that were with him fought on foot, and he was killed.

When Muzaffar Gujarátí heard of the doparture of Khán-khánán with his troops and family, he eame to Amarún,² where the tomb of Malik Dáwaru-l Mulk is, and laid the foundations of an army. Kalíj Khán remained to guard Ahmadábád, and I with Saiyid Kásim and * * went to disperse the insurgents who had killed Ráí Singh. When I roached Halwad, I sent a detachment to ravage the villages in the pargana of Mália,³ which belongs to Khangár; and I sent another detachment, under Mediní Ráí, to Amarún, against Muzaffar. Upon their approaching that place, Muzaffar went off to Káthíwár and hid himself. The Jám sent his son to me to mako excuses for his cruel treatment of Ráí Singh, and Khangár also sent his agents to renew his promises of loyalty. I then returned to Ahmadábád. After my arrival there Kalíj Khán started for Surat, and encamped outsido the city.

It then occurred to Muzaffar that after the departure of the army and the return of each man to his jágir, he would make a dash upon Dúlaka and Kambay, as he might thus be able to raise a force before the return of the Imperial army. So he advanced rapidly upon Dúlaka at the head of two thousand horsemen. Káthis and Jhárejas. On receiving letters from Medini Rái, who was at Dúlaka, I instantly took horse and started thither. As I was resting till evening at Sarkaj, Kalíj Khán came in and joined me with all the chief nobles and men of the city. Next morning we arrived at Dúlaka, but then Muzaliar was four kee away. For when his scouts informed him that the army of Ahmadábád was approaching, he fell back to Morbi.

The Imperial army occupied Dúlaka, and at night Kalíj Khán returned to Ahmadábád. I and my companious followed Muzaffar. One night and the next day we travelled forty-five kos. On reaching Biram-gám, we heard that Muzaffar had gone to the village of Akhár, which was four kos off, and had there shut up Saiyid Mustafa, son of Saiyid Jalál, who happened to be there with his family. Night had come on, and we were unable to proceed farther. So I sent twenty horsemen, with a pair of kettle-drams, directing them to go about a kos from the village, and beat them, that Muzaffar might suppose our army to be near and give up the siege. By God's help my stratagem succeeded, the beleaguered people were released, and Muzaffar went off to the Ran and Kach. In the morning I mounted and hastened off in pursuit. I went as far as the Ran; then leaving an outpost in the village of Jhajúsa,2 near the water, I returned to Ahmadábád.

Four months afterwards, the zamindars of Kach collected a force of nearly a thousand horse and ten thousand foot, under the command of Jasá and Bajáín, nephews of Khangár. They proceeded to the village of Rádhanpúr, one of the dependencies of Pattan, and laid siege to the fort. When intelligence of this arrived at Ahmadábád, I and * * went off to relieve the place. On hearing of our approach, the enemy took flight, passed over the Ran, and went into their own country.

It was necessary to put an end to these proceedings, so I crossed over the Ran into Kach at a place whore the water was not more than three kos wide, and set to work plundering and destroying. We burnt and destroyed the towns of Karí and Katáriá, two places well known in Kach. We realized an enormous booty, and after plundering and destroying nearly three hundred villages in the course of three days, we re-crossed the Ran opposite Mália and Morbí. Here the Ran was twelve kos wide, and we were engaged from dawn till eve in the passage. The water was up to a man's navel. After crossing we ravaged and destroyed the parganas of Mália and Morbí, which belonged to Khangár.

We remained at Morbi three days. Here I wrote to Khangár, telling him how I had been informed that the hostile proceedings were the work of Jasá and Bajáin, and had not been sanctioned by him. I had therefore inflicted a little punishment. Had it been otherwise, I would have attacked Bhúj, his residence. If he did not henceforth act loyally, he would see what would happen. Khangár sent his vakils to me with his apologies. After this a barrier was raised (against inroads).

In the year 995 the younger son of Amín Khán rebelled against him, and went to Muzaffar, and brought him against his father. When I heard this, I went with * * against Muzaffar, to repress this outbreak. On arriving at Rájkot, 180 kos from Ahmadábád, and thirty from Júnagarh, Muzaffar made off towards the Ran. Sídí Ríhan, vakil of Amín Khán, and a promoter of the strife, with Nokín Gohil, and other zamindárs, and Bír Khán Singh, Malik Rájan, and others of the chief men of those parts, nearly five hundred horsemen, separated from the insurgents, and came in to make peace. I treated them hospitably, and held out to them expectations of royal favour. The Jám and Amín Khán also sent their sons to me, and renewed their professions of loyalty.

After returning to Ahmadábád, I turned my thoughts to the repression of the Grássias. In the course of two months I fitted out an army, and then marched towards Othaníya and Ahmad-nagar. I attacked and laid waste nearly fifty villages of the Kolís and Grássias, and I built forts in seven different places to keep these people in check. Falling back with my forces, I went to Wákánírú and Sarnál, to put down the mutinous proceedings of the Grássias. Having put Chait Ráwat to death, I removed Karmí Kolí, Kishna Kolí, and Lakha Rájpút, who were the principal Grássias of those parts, and left forts and garrisons in their places.

In the year 996 the Emperor gave Gujarát to 'Azam Khán, and recalled me to Court. By rapid stages I reached the Imperial Court at Lahore in fourteen days, and was most graciously received.

The intelligence of the successes in Gujarát reached the Emperor as he was travelling. He returned thanks to God for his success, and continued his journey in great joy. At this time Zain Khán Koka, Rájá Rám Chandar Rájá of Bittiah, a man of high repute among the Rájás of Hindústán, who had never before acknowledged allegiance to the Sultáns of Hindústáu, now expressed his desire of doing so, and came to wait upon the Emperor at Fathpúr. He was graciously received. He presented as his tribute one hundred and twenty elephants, and a fine ruby, valued at fifty thousand rupees.

Thirtieth year of the Reign.

The thirtieth year of the reign and the Nauros-i Sultani, or New Year's Day of the Ilahi era, now arrived. [Rejoicings.] Letters arrived from Mirzá Muhammad Hakim, relating that 'Abdu-lla Khán Uzbek had obtained possession of Badakhshán, and that Mirzá Sháh Rukh and Mirzá Sulaimán were coming to Hindústán. [Mirzá Sháh Rukh crosses the Indus and meets with a gracious reception from the Emperor in 993 H. Marriage of Prince Salim with the daughter of Rajá Bhagwan Dás. Great ceremony and rejoicing.]

Thirty-first year of the Reign.

The Nauroz-i Sultani of the thirty-first year of the reign and the first year of the second karn of the reign fell upon Thursday, 19th Rabi'u-l awwal, 993 H. (11th March, 1585). [The usual rejoicings.]

At the beginning of this year Mir Murtaza and Khudáwand Khán, amirs of the Dakhin, came to the Imperial Court. Their affairs have been already noticed in describing the occurrences in Gujarát. When they were defeated by Salábat Khán, and came to Burhánpúr, Rájá 'Alí Khán, the governor of that place, took their elephants from them, and he sent 150 of them in charge of his son to the Emperor. The Dakhiní amirs were received, and presented their tribute on New Year's Day.

Mír Fathu-lla Shirází, who had the title of 'Azdu-d daula, was now created chief Sadr of Hindústán, and received at the same time a horse, a robe, and five thousand rupees.

Letters arrived from Kábul, stating that * * Mirzá Sulaimán, with the assistance of Mirzá Muhammad Hakím, had returned to Badakhshán, and obtained a victory over the army of 'Abdu-lla Khán Uzbek. * * * Letters now arrived from Atak-Banáras, from Kunwar Mán Singh and Khwája Shamsu-dín Muhammad, with the information that Mirzá Muhammad Hakím was very ill. That Farídún had started with a caravan from Pesháwar to Kábul, but had been defeated by Afgháns in the Khaibar Pass, and compelled to retreat to Pesháwar. That a fire had broken out in the fort of Pesháwar, and that a thousand camcl-loads of merchandize had been consumed. That through this disaster Farídún had got free, and had gone by another road to Kábul, and that seventy men had perished on the journey from thirst.

'Abdu-lla Khán of Badaklıshán, when he was informed of Mirzá Sulaimán's success, gathered a strong force, which he sent to oppose him. Mirzá Sulaimán, unable to cope with this army, retreated to Kábul, and all Badaklıshán came into the power of the Uzbeks.

Intelligence now reached the Emperor of the death of Mirzá Muhammad Hakim. The Mirzá was the Emperor's own brother, but the Emperor had shown him kindness and affection greater than even that of a brother. For the Mirzá had often been presumptuous and aggressive, and the Emperor had not only pardoned him and showed him favour, but had sent amirs and armies to maintain him in Kábul. He was greatly addicted to wine, and excessive drinking was the cause of his illness and death. He died on the 12th Sha'bán, 993. When the news of his death reached the Emperor, he was much grieved; and after the period of mourning was over, his purpose was to confirm the country of Kabul to the sons of the Mirza. But the nobles urged that the Mirzá's sons were of tender ago, and incapable of ruling; and that the Uzbek army which had already taken Badakhshan was on the look out for Kabul also. These considerations induced the Emperor to march to the Panjáb, and he began his march on the 10th Ramazán. * *

The Emperor travelled on by successive stages without making any halt to Dehli. There he visited the tomb of his father and the shrines of the saints, and dispensed his charity upon the poor, and celebrated the 'I'd. On the 19th Shawwal he reached the banks of the Sutlej and encamped. There he was informed that Kunwar Mán Singh had sent a body of men across the Indus to Pesháwar, and that Sháh Beg, the officer of Mirzá Muhammad Hakím, had fled to Kábul.

Sádik Khán was sent from Lahore to take charge of the Government of Bhakar. On the 17th Zi-l ka'da the Emperor encamped by the side of the Chinab; * * * and on the 28th he reached and crossed the Behut (Beyah). Here he received a despatch from Kunwar Máu Singh, reporting that the people of Kábul had willingly submitted to the Imperial rule. Muhammad 'Alí Khazánchí, who had been sent to Kábul, returned and reported that when Muhammad Hakim Mirzá died, his sons 1 more so young and incapable, that the direction of affairs at Kábul was in the hands of the nobles, who were favourable to the claims of the Emperor. Moreover, Faridán Khán, the nucle of the late Mirzá, when Kunwar Mán Singh entered Kábul in hot haste, finding that he was helpless, brought the young princes to wait upon the Kunwar. They were received with great kindness and assurances of protection. Kunwar Mán Singh left his own sons in Kábul in the charge of Shamsu-d dín Kháfi, and set off with the young princes and the nobles of Kábul to meet the Emperor. On the 25th Zí-l hijja the Kunwar brought the princes and the Kábul nobles into the presence of the Emperor at the town of Ráwal-pindí, which is situated between Rohtás and Atak. They were received with princely generosity. Each of the chief attendants received five thousand or six thousand rupces as a gift. Suitable allowances and jágirs were also granted.

When the Emperor reached Atak, he sent Bhagwan Dás, Sháh Kulí Mahram, and other well-known amirs, with about 5000 horse, to effect the conquest of Kashmír. On the same day Isma'il Kulí Khán and Rái Singh were sent against the Bilúchis. Next day Zain Khán Koka was sent with a force against the Afgháns of Swád (Swát) and Bajaur, to reduce that turbulent people to order. The Emperor encamped at Atak on the 15th Muharram, 994.

In former times 1 a Hindústání soldier had come among the Afgháns, and set up an heretical sect. 2 He induced many foolish people to become his disciples, and he gave himself the title of Pir Roshanái. He was dead, but his son Jalála, a youth of about fourteen, came, in the year 989 H., to wait upon the Emperor, as he was returning from Kábul. He was kindly received; but after a few days his evil disposition induced him to take flight, and go off to the Afgháns. There he raised disturbances; and gathering a good number of men around him, he shut up the to repair the disaster. The Rájá entered the mountain region with great caution. Here and there he built forts, and harried and plundered continually, so that he reduced the Afgháns to great straits. Rájá Mán Singh, who had marched against these sectaries, fought a hard battle with them in the Khaibar Pass, in which many of them were slain and made prisoners. The Rájá obtained a great victory.

News now arrived that Mír Kuraish was coming to Court as an ambassador from 'Abdu-lla Khán Uzbek, King of Máwarán-n nahr, bringing presents. Nazar Be,¹ who was one of the great nobles of 'Abdu-lla Khán, being offended with the Khán, was also coming with his three sons, Kabz Be, Shádí Be, and Bákí Be, all of whom had attained the rank of nobles. The Emperor sent Shaikh Farid Bakhshí and Ahmad Beg Kábulí, with a party of ahadis, to meet the caravan and bring it through the Khaibar Pass. This armed party, with the help of Knnwar Mán Singh, brought the caravan through the pass, having beaten the black sectaries who attempted to block the road, and killed many of them.

Thirty-second year of the Reign.

On the 11th Rabi'u-l ákhir, 995 (11th March, 1587 A.D.), when the sun passed from Pisces to Aries, the Nauroz-i Sultáni was eelebrated at the fort of Atak, and Kunwar Mán Singh came to the feast.

When Mirzá Sháh Rukh, Rájá Bhagwán Dás, and Sháh Kulí Khán Mahram reached the pass of Bhúliyás,² on the confines of Kashmír, Yúsuf Khán, the ruler of that country, came up and blockaded the pass. The Imperial forces remained for some days inactive, snow and rain came on, and the supplies of corn were cut off. Moreover, the news of the defeat of Zain Khán arrived, and the army was in great difficulty. The amirs resolved to make peace. They settled a tribute to be paid by saffron, shawls, and by the mint to the royal treasury, and they appointed collectors.1 Yusuf was delighted with these terms, and came to visit the amirs, and they brought him along with them to see the Emperor. When they came to Court, the Emperor disapproved of the peace, and the amirs were forbidden his presence; but after some days they were allowed to make their obeisances.

About this time the ambassador of 'Abdu-lla Khán with Nazar Be and his sons arrived, and had an interview. Isma'il Kuli Khán and Ráí Singh also arrived, bringing with them the chief men and leaders of the Bilúchis. A sum of four lacs of tankas. equal to five hundred tumuns of 'Irak, was presented as a gift to Nazar Be and his sons. After the feast of the Nauroz was over. Kunwar Mán Singh was ordered to go to the support of Rúiá Todar Mal, who had been sent against the Yúsufzáí Afgháns and others. When the Emperor had settled the course to be pursued with the Afghans, and the affairs of Atak and Kahnl. he resolved to return to Lahore, and started on the 24th Rabi'u-s sáuí. Hunting and amusing himself as he went, he arrived at Lahore on the 18th Junáda-s sání.2

When Kunwar Mán Singh was appointed to the government of Kábul, Isma'il Kulí Khán was sent from the river Behnt (Beyali) in command of a strong force against the Yusufzai and other Afgháns. An Imperial order was issued to Knuwar Mán Singh, that when Isma'il Kuli arrived, the Kunwar was to go on to Kábul. Saiyid Bukhárí also was appointed to support Isma'íl Kuli, and was directed to occupy Peshawar.

Mír 'Arab Bahádur, who had fled for refuge into the hills of Kamaun, and had troubled the inhabitants of the country at the foot of the hills, was killed by the servants of Mir Abú-l Fath in the pargana of Sherkot.

On the 13th Rajab the ceremony of weighing the Emperor was performed, and a splendid festival was held; and on the Isia Prince Salím was married to the daughter of Rái Singh, one of the great nobles. The Rájá sent fine presents with his daughter, and felt highly honoured by the alliance.

Muhammad Kásim Khán Mir-bahr and * * was sent with a large force to effect the conquest of Kashmír. After seven marches they entered the defiles of the mountains. When they reached the pass of Kartal, Ya'kúb, the son of Yúsuf Khán,1 considering himself ruler of Kashmír, came with a considerable force to oppose them. He closed the pass, and there took his post. But fortune fought for the Imperial army, and the stone of dissension was cast among the Kashmírís. The chiefs of Kashmir were distressed with the rule of Ya'kúb, and several deserted from him and joined Kasim Khan. Another party raised the standard of rebellion in Srínagar, which is the capital of the country. Ya'kúb, deeming it of primary importance to crush the internal rebellion, returned to Kashmir. The Imperial army then entered Kashmír without opposition, and Ya'kúb, unable to make any resistance, fled to the mountains. Srínagar was occupied, and revenue collectors were appointed to all the parganas.

The Emperor, on being informed of the conquest, sent letters of thanks to Kásim Khán and the other amirs, and bestowed honours and promotions upon all of them. Ya'kúb raised a force, and fought with Kásim Kháu, but was defeated. Another time he tried a night surprise, but was unsuccessful. The royal forces pursued him into hills full of trees and defiles, beating him and driving him before them. He was very nearly captured. At last, in wretched plight and in humble mood, he waited upon Kásim Khán, and enrolled himself among the subjects of the Imperial throne. The country of Kashmír was thus cleared.

² He was eventually sent into Bihar to Raja Man Singh, to join his father; and both Yasuf and Ya'kab there died in confinement, worn out with trouble and chagrin.

—Badaani, vol. ii. p. 353. Aba-l Fazl, however, says that "Yasuf was released from prison, and received a jagir, so that he might learn better manners, and appreciate the kind treatment he had received."—Akbar-nama, vol. iii. p. 649.

On the 19th Ramazán the ambassador of 'Abdu-lla Khán received leave to return. Hakím Humám * was sent as envoy to 'Abdu-lla Khán, and Mir Sadr Jahán * as a complimentary visitor to Iskandar Khán, the father of 'Abdu-lla Khán. Nearly a lac and a half of rupees, equal to three thousand seven hundred tûmâns of 'Irák, goods of Hindústán, and curiosities were entrusted to Muhammad 'Alí Khazánchí for presentation to 'Abdu-lla Khán.

Saiyid Hůmid Bukhárí, formerly one of the nobles of the Sultáns of Gujarát, had been received into the Imperial service, and was sent to Pesháwar for the repression of the Roshanáí sectaries. They had assembled about 20,000 foot and 5000 horse to attack him. He, and a few men who were with him at the time, fought and perished. The Emperor sent Zain Khán Koka and * * with a large force to subdue these heretics, who occupied the Khaibar Pass, and closed the road between Kábul and Hindústán. Kunwar Mán Singh marched from Kábul, and attacked and defeated them in the Khaibar, and put a great many of them to the sword. He then occupied Jamrúd, and left a detachment in the Khaibar.

Mirzá Sulaimán, having returned from his pilgrimage to Mecca, once more tried his fortune in Badakhshán; but he was unable to contend against 'Abdu-lla Khán Uzbek, and fled to Kábul. From thence he went to Hindústán, and was received by the Emperor in the month of Rabí'n-l awwal, 995 m.

Thirty-third year of the Reign.

Kunwar Mán Singh completely subdued Jalála the sectary,

^{1 &}quot;Next day the heretics assembled in great force, and howling all night and day like jackals, they kept up a fight in all directions. so that he could no longer make any resistance, and was compelled to take flight towards Bangash. 'Abdu-l Matlab Khán, and * * were sent after him with a detachment to Bangash. Jalála deceived the royal commanders, and gathering a nuncrous force around him, he attacked them, and a fierce battle ensued. But the rabble were defeated and put to flight, and many of them were killed.

In this year a son was born to Prince Salim by the daughter of Rájá Bhagwán Dás. [Rejoicings.]

Campaign against Sihreán.

In this year Sádik Khán, the governor of Bhakar, under orders, proceeded to attack the country of Tatta. He besieged the fort of Sihwán, and Jání Beg, ruler of Tatta, grandson of Muhammad Bákí Tarkhán, following the humble practice of his ancesters, sent envoys with suitable gifts to the Imperial Court. The Emperor took compassion on him, and sent a furmán to Sádik Khán, saying, "I bestow the country upon Jání Beg. Withdraw from its occupation." On the 25th Zí-l ka'da the envoys of Jání Beg received leave to depart; and to show them greater honour, Hakím 'Aínu-l Mulk was sent with them, and they received many princely gifts.

At the beginning of Rabi'u-s sání the government of Kábul was given to Zain Khán Koka, and Rájá Mán Singh was recalled to Court. At the end of the same month Khán-khánán Mirzá Khán made a rapid journey from Gujarát with 'Azdu-d daula, and was most graciously received. On the 28th Rajab Sádik Khán came from Bhakar. Mán Singh arrived in Sha'bán, and at the end of the year ho was appointed governor of Bihár, Hájípúr, and Patna. About the same time the government of Kashmír was given to Mirzá Yúsuf Khán Rizwi, and Kásim Khán Mìr-bahr was recalled. Sádik Khán was sent to Swát and Bajaur against the Yúsufzáís, and the jágírs of Mán Singh at Síálkot and elsewhere were granted to him. Isma'íl Kulí Khán was recalled from Swát and Bajaur, and sent to Gujarát, to replace Kalij Khán, who was summoned to Court. The government of Bihár and Bengal was conferred on Kunwar Mán Singh.

Thirty-fourth year of the Reign.

The beginning of this year corresponded with Saturday, 4th Jumáda-l awwal, 997 (11th March, 1589). [The usual festival of eighteen days.]

Kalíj Khán arrived from Gujarát, and was appointed to assist Rájá Todar Mal² in Revenue and Civil administration. Hakím 'Aínu-l Mulk returned from his embassy to Tatta with the envoys of Jání Beg Tarkhán, who brought the offerings of the Beg along with a letter.

On the 22nd Jumáda-s sání, 997, the Emperor started to pay a visit to Kashmír and Kábul. On reaching Bhimbhar, at the beginning of the mountains of Kashmír, he there left the ladies of the harem with the Prince Murád, and went on express. On the 1st Sha'bán he reached Srínagar, where he remained some days, visiting the city and neighbourhood. When the rainy season came on, letters were sent for the ladies of the harem and Prince Murád to go to Rohtás, and there await his return. Amír Fathu-lla Shírazí ['Azdu-d daula] died in Kashmír, to the great sorrow of the Emperor. Shaikh Faizí wrote an elegy upon him. * *

On the 27th Ramazán the Emperor started for Kábul by way of Pakhali and the fort of Atak. Abú-l Fath, one of His Majesty's friends and companions, died at Dhamtaur, and was buried at Hasan Abdál. Prince Murád and the ladies, by command of the Emperor, came up to Atak from Rohtás. Here Sháhbáz Khán Kambú was sent against the remaining Afgháns. His Majesty then crossed the Indus, and proceeded on to Kábul, where he arrived on the 22nd Zi-l ka'da. Hakim Humam and Mir Sadr Jahan, who had been sent on an embassy to Mawaran-nahr, now roturned, bringing with them an ambassador from 'Abdu-lla Khan, who was the bearer of a letter and presents. His Majesty spent two months at Kabul, often visiting the gardens and places of interest. All the people of Kabul, noble and simple, profited by his presence.

arrived at Court, having performed the journey in twelve days. He was very kindly received. Rájá Bhagwán Dás being dead, his son Mán Singh, one of the great nobles and governor of Bihár and Bengal, succeeded to the title of Rájá, and the Emperor sent him a letter by one of his attendants with a robe and horse.

'Azam Khán's Campaign in Gujarát.

When 'Azam Khán arrived in Gujarát, he essayed to conquer the territory of the Jám,² one of the samindárs of that quarter, who maintained a numerous body of men. The Jám, in concert with Daulat Khán, son of Amín Khán, ruler of Júnagarh, and locum tenens of his father, and several other samindárs, assembled nearly twenty thousand horse. 'Azam Khán divided his army into seven divisions, and some severe fighting followed. Saiyid Kásim Bárha, in command of the advanced force, fought bravely. Khwája Muhammad Rafía', commander of the left, was killed with some other amirs, old servants of the State. Mír Sharafu-d dín, nephew of Mír Abú Turáb, was killed with the van. Four thousand Rájpúts fell in the battle. The eldest son and representative of the Jám, with his wasir, were among the slain. Victory declared itself in favour of 'Azam Khán. The date of the battle was 6th Shawwál, 998 H.3

The city of Lahore had been for some years (chand sál) the royal residence, and many chiefs of that quarter had come to wait upon the Emperor. But Jání Beg, of Tatta, although he had sent letters and tribute, had never come in person to enrol himself among the supporters of the Imperial throne. Khán-khánán was now appointed governor of Multán and Bhakar, and he was commanded to effect the conquest of Sind and the Bilúchís. In the month of Rabí'u-s sání he was sent on his enterprise along with * * * and a number of nobles, whose Thirty-sixth year of the Reign.

The beginning of this year corresponded with Thursday, 24th Jumáda-l awwal, 999 n. (11th March, 1591). [Usual rejoicings.]

In Shawwal of this year four servants of the State were selected to go on missions to the four rulers of the Dakhin. The King of Poets, Shaikh Faizi, was sent to Raja 'Ali Khan, the ruler of Asir and Burhanpur. Khwaja Aminu-d din was sent to Burhanu-l Mulk, who, supported by the arms of the Imperial Government, held Ahmadnagar, the seat of his ancestors. Mir Muhammad Amin was sent to 'Adil Khan, the ruler of Bijapur; and Mir Mirza to Kutbu-l Mulk, the ruler of Golconda. Shaikh Faizi received directions to proceed to Burhanu-l Mulk after having terminated his own mission.

On the 28th Zí-l hijja Prince Sháh Murád, better known by his cognomen, "Pahárí Jíú," was appointed to the Government of Málwa, receiving the standard, kettle-drums, the taman, the tugh banner, and all the insignia pertaining to a prince royal. Isma'il Kulí Khán was appointed to be his vakil (general manager), and * * were also sent to serve under him. When the Prince reached Gwálior, ho found that Madhukar, samindár of Undachah, who held a prominent position among the Rájás of these parts, on account of his numerous adherents, had seized upon the parganas of Gwálior. So the Prince resolved to chastise him. Madhukar assembled his numerous forces to resist, but he was defeated in battle, and obliged to fly into the jungles and hills. All his territory was ravaged, and then his son, Ram Chandar, who was his eldest son and representative, came humbly to beg for mercy, and to be admitted a subject of the Imperial throne. He waited on the Prince, and presented a large tribute, and the Prince sent him to the Emperor, who, when he arrived, granted him pardon for his offences. The Prince took up his residence at Ujjain.

'Azam Khán, after his victory over the Jám, remained for a time at Ahmadábád, and then resolved upon the conquest of Súrath and the fort of Júnagarh. Daulat Khán, son of Amín Khán, who had succeeded his father as chief, had been wounded in a battle with the Jám, and was dead. Having determined upon this campaign, 'Azam Khán proceeded to the country. The son of Daulat Khán, with his father's ministers, took refuge in the fortress (of Júnagarh) and temporized. But when they found matters going ill with them, the ministers begged for mercy, and brought the youth to 'Azam Khán, presenting the keys of the fortress, and professing their allegiance. This conquest was effected on the 5th Zí-l ka'da.

and morasses (chihla). Here he entrenched his force. Khán-khánán raised batteries before it, and besieged it for two months. During this time the Emperor sent 150,000 rupees, then 100,000 rupees, then 100,000 mans of grain, with several 2 large guns and many gunners, to reinforce Khán-khánán. He also sent Rájá Ráí Singh, a noble of four thousand, by the route of Jesalmír.

Thirty-seventh year of the Reign.

The beginning of this year corresponded with Saturday, 6th Jumáda-l ákhir, 1000 H. [Usual rejoicings at Lahore.]

Jalála the sectary, who had fled to 'Abdu-lla Khán [in Badakhshán], now returned, and again engaged in revolt and robbery. On New Year's Day Ja'far Beg Asaf Khán, the bakhshi, was named to lead an army against him in communication with Muhammad Kásim Khán, governor of Kábul. I, the author, was appointed to the post of bakhshi. At the end of Sha'ban, Zain Khán Koka, who had been sent to settle the country of Swát and Bajaur, and to root out those Afgháns who had escaped the sword, was ordered to march and exterminate Jalála.

On the 24th Shawwal, agreeing with 12th Amurdad of the 37th year of the reign, the Emperor set off hunting to the banks of the Chinab, on the way to Kashmir. He passed the Ravi, and stayed for five days, enjoying himself in the garden of Ram Das. From thence he made a march of three kos. Then he appointed Kalij Khan and Mota Raja to take charge of affairs at Lahore. As it was now the rainy season, and the waters were out, he left Prince Salim to march on slowly with the camp, while he hastened on with his hunting attendants to the Chinab. Here he received intelligence that Yadgar, nephew of Mirza Yusuf Khan Rizwi, governor of Kashmir, had conspired with some disaffected Kashmiris, and having raised the standard of revolt, had assumed the title of Sultan. Kazi 'Ali, the diwan of Kashmír, and Husain Beg Shaikh Umarí, the collector (tahsildár-i akhráj), attacked him with their men, but Kází 'Alí was killed, and Husain Beg was glad to escape half dead to Rájaurí. His Majesty sent Faríd Bakhsh with a party of amírs, such as * * *, and a thousand Badakhshání Aimák horsemen, into Kashmír. He himself crossed the Chináb, and waited there for a while hunting, until Prince Salím came up with the camp.

Khán-khánán had besieged Jání Beg for two months. day there was fighting, and loss on both sides. The Sindians had got possession of the roads, and prevented the passage of provisions. Grain had consequently become very scarce, and bread exceedingly dear. Khán-khánán had no resource but to move away, so he set off towards the pargana of Jun, near Tatta. But he sent a portion of his force, under Saiyid Baháu-d dín Bukhárí * *, Mír Muhammad Ma'súm Bhakarí, and other of his officers, to invest Sihwan. Jani Beg, assuming Sihwan force to be weak in numbers, marched against it. When Khánkhánán heard of this movement, he sent off with all possible speed Daulat Khán Lodí, Khwája Muhammad Hakím Bakhshi, Dhárú son of Rájá Todar Mal, Dal Bait the son of Rái Singh, and * * to reinforce the Sihwan division. This detachment marched eighty kos in two days, and effected a junction.

Next day Jání Beg came up and arrayed his army. Daulat Khán also made his dispositions. His force amounted to only two thousand, while Jání Beg had more than five thousand. But confident in the Imperial good fortune, they went into battle. Rájá Todar Mal's son Dhárú fought most bravely, and was killed. The wind of victory blew upon the royal standards, and Jání Beg flew towards the banks of the river. He stopped at the village of Unarpúr,² on the banks of the river, and again entrenched himself. Khán-khánán upon his side, and the Sihwán force upon the other, bore down upon him and besieged him. There was fighting every day. At length Jání Beg's men were reduced to eat their horses and camels, and many were killed

In the midst of the rejoicings, on the 24th Jumáda-s sání, Khán-khánán arrived with Jání Beg, the ruler of Tatta, and was graciously received. Sháh Beg Khán, and * * other amtrs who had taken part in this campaign, also presented themselves at Court, and were suitably rewarded, with jágirs, increase of allowances, and promotion.

At the time when the fort of Júnagarh and the country of Súrath were subdued and annexed to the Imperial dominions, Sultán Muzaffar Gujarátí, who was in that part of the country, fled and betook himself to Khangár, the zamindár of the country of Kach. 'Azam Khán attacked Khangár and ravaged some of his territories. This induced him to proffer his own allegiance, and to make Muzaffar a prisoner. Under this arrangement the son of 'Azam Khán made a sudden unexpected attack upon the place where Muzaffar was staying, and took him prisoner. As they were going along, Muzaffar made an excuse for retiring into privacy, and then cut his throat with a razor so that he died. His head was then cut off and sent to 'Azam Khán, who sent it on to the Emperor.

One hundred and twenty elephants, taken by Rájá Mán Singh in Orissa, now arrived at Court, and were presented to the Emperor. 'Azam Khán Mirzá 'Azíz Koka had now been absent from Court ten years, so a farmán was written ealling him to Court, to receive the marks of royal approbation. Meanwhile some mischief-makers had reported to the Khán some unkind words which the Emperor was said to have used regarding him.¹ So on the 1st Rajab he embarked in a ship with his sons and family, and sailed for Hijjáz. When the Emperor was informed of this, he gave the country of Gujarát to Prince Sháh Murád, and a farmán was issued directing him to proceed from Málwa to Gujarát. Muhammad Sádik Khán, one of the great nobles, was appointed his vakil, and the sarkárs of Surat, Broach and Baroda, were assigned to him in jágir.

On the 21st Amurdád of the 38th year of the reign, agreeing with 14th Zí-l ka'da, 1001 H., Zain Khán Koka and Asaf Khán, who had been sent to chastise the Afgháns of Swát and Bajaur, and to repress Jalála the sectary, killed a great many of them, and sent the wives and family of Jalála and of Wahdat 'Alí, his brother, with all their friends, nearly four hundred in number, to Court.

On the 29th Zí-l ka'da the government of Málwa was given to Mirzá Sháh Rukh; and Sháhbáz Khán Kambú, who had been three years in prison, was released, and appointed to be the vakil and general manager of the affairs of Málwa, under Sháh Rukh.

On the 12th Muharram, 1002, Mirzá Rustam, son of Sultán Husain Mirzá, son of Bahrám, son of Sháh Isma'il Safawi (Sháh of Persia), who held the government of Zamín-dáwar, came to bring a complaint to the Emperor, accompanied by his sons and family. [Grand reception.] The Emperor presented him with a kror of tankas, made him a panj-hazári, and gave him Multán in jágír.

At this time the Prince of Poets, Shaikh Faizí, returned from his mission to Rájá 'Alí Khán and Burhánu-l Mulk Dakhiní. Mir Muhammad Amín, Mír Munír, and Amínu-d dín also returned from their missions to the different rulers of the Dakhin. Burhánu-l Mulk had received favours and assistance from His Majesty, but now he did not send suitable tribute, nor did he act in a grateful and becoming way. His tribute did not exceed fifteen elephants, some fabrics of the Dakhin, and a few jewels. So the Emperor determined to effect the conquest of the Dakhin, and on the 21st Muharram he appointed Prince Dániyál to command the invading army. Khán-khánán, Ráí Singh, Ráí Bíl, Hakím 'Aínu-l Mulk, and other amirs of Málwa, and júgirdárs of the subás of Ajmír and Dehlí, were appointed to attend him. Seventy thousand horse were ordered on this campaign.

Badauni (vol. ii. p. 388) gives the incredible number of "14,000."

The Emperor himself went out with them, hunting as he went, as far as the river of Sultanpur, thirty-five kos from Lahore. Khankhanan, in attendance upon Prince Daniyal, had come as far as Sirhind, and was summoned to hold a Council with the Emperor. He joined the royal party at Shaikhupur, and the campaign in the Dakhin was re-considered. Khan-khanan was now ordered to proceed on the service alone, without troubling Prince Daniyal. An order was published that the army of the Dakhin was to serve under Khan-khanan, and Prince Daniyal was recalled. With high marks of favour Khan-khanan commenced the march. He took leave of the Emperor at Agra, and His Majesty returned, hunting as he went, to the capital Lahore.

I have thus written a history of the occurrences of the reign of the Emperor Akbar, as perfect as my poor pen can accomplish, up to the thirty-eighth year of his reign. If life is spared, and grace is given to me, I will, please God, also record the events of days to come, so that my volume may be completed.

Husain Khán Tukriya.2

He was called Tukriya, from the fact of his having issued an order, when he was Governor of Lahore, to the effect that Hindús should bear on their shoulders a discriminating mark, which being called in Hindí, Tukri, obtained for him the nickname of Tukriya. He was nephew and son-in-law of Imám Mahdí Kásim Khán, and was a mansabdár of 2000. He died A.H. 983.³

² These two Extracts are from the biographical portion of the work, which comes in at the end of the reign of Akbar. They appeared in the old Vol. of 1849.

Mir Fathu-lla Shirasi.

In the year 990 H., corresponding with the 26th of the Iláhí, the Amír arrived at Court from the Dakhin, and was received with royal favour. He was directed, in conjunction with the ministers, to revise the system of administration, and to inquire into the management of the civil and revenue administration.\(^1\) On this duty he was engaged for many years, and, in token of the King's satisfaction, was honoured with the title of 'Azdu-d daulah. He was a very learned man, and was better versed in every kind of knowledge, theoretical and practical, than any man in Khurásán, 'Irák, or Hindústán. In short, in the whole world he was without a rival. He was also an adept in the secret arts of magic and enchantment. For instance, he made a windmill which produced flour by a self-generated movement. * * In Kashmír, he departed for the land of eternity in the year 997 H.

Sultán Mahmud Khán of Multán?

A few days after, Sultán Mahmúd assembled an army, and marched on Shor, when Jám Báyazíd, leading out 'Alam Khán, with the general consent of his followers, advanced to the distance of twenty miles from Shor to meet him. When he reached the Ráví, he halted, and sent a letter to Daulat Khán Lodí, acquainting him with the particulars of the movement. Upon receipt of this intelligence, Daulat Khán Lodí, at the head of the Panjáb forces, came to the assistance of Jám Báyazíd before the conflict was at an end, and despatched a confidential person to Sultán Mahmúd, to enter into a negociation for peace. At last, through his mediation, a peace was arranged, under the terms of which the Raví was to be the boundary. Daulat Khan then sent Sultan Mahmud back to Multan, and Jam Bayazid to Shor; after which, he himself proceeded to Lahore.

² These Extracts are from the separate history of Multan. They were printed in the old Vol. of 1849.

Notwithstanding that the terms of peace had been adjusted by so wise a man as Daulat Khán, yet it did not endure long. In the interim, Mír Jákír Zand, with his two sons, named Mír Ilahdád and Mír Shahdád, came to Multán from Maví. It was Mír Shahdád that introduced the principles of the Shí'a creed into Multán.

As the Langáh family had great respect for Malik Suhráb Dúdárí, Mír Jákír Zand could not remain in Multán. Ho therefore sought the protection of Jám Báyazíd, who treated him with respect, and was pleased to grant a portion of his private domain for the support of the Mír's family.

Jám Báyazíd was a man of beneficent character and of generous spirit, and was particularly anxious to promote the interests of the learned and virtuous. He is said to have sent their pensions to Multán from Shor, even during the period of actual hostilities. His generosity towards men of talent was so notorious, that many persons of distinction quitted their homes and took up their abode at Shor. He earnestly invited many others to resort to that place, and among them Mauláná 'Azízu-lla, pupil of Mauláná Fathu-lla, whom he urgently pressed to come. On his approach to Shor, Jám Báyazíd received him with much honour, conducted him to his private apartments, and ordered his servants to pour water over the Mauláná's hands, and then, by way of a blessing, to sprinkle the same water on the four corners of his house.

There is a curious anecdote concerning the Mauláná and Shaikh Jalálu-d dín Kuraishí, vahil of Jám Báyazíd, which, though not much to the purpose of this history, is yet here recorded for an example, and as an awakening from the sleep of neglect.

It is this:-When the Jam received the Maulana with such unusual distinction, and took him into his private apartments, the Shaikh sent to the Maulana, and told him that Jam Báyazíd had given him his compliments, and desired that the Manláná shonld select for himself one of the slave-girls who had been ordered to attend him. The Manlana sent one of his own servants to Jám Báyazíd, and said in reply, "God forbid that a man should ever look upon the women of his friend; moreover, such sentiments are unworthy of my advanced age." Báyazíd replied that he had no knowledge of the imputed message. The Manlana being much embarrassed at this, eursed the person that sent the message to him, saying, " May his neck be broken!" and returned to his home without even seeing Jám Báyazid, who was not informed of his departure until he had actually left his dominions. It so happened that the curse of the Mauláná took effect; for after Shaikh Jalálu-d dín came to Shor, having deserted the service of Sultan Sikandar, he chanced one night to miss his footing, when he fell from an upper storey with his head downwards, and literally broke his neck.

After the conquest of the Panjáb in 930 H. by the late Zahíru-d dín Muhammad Bábar Bádsháh Ghází, that monarch. at the time of his return to Dehlí, sent a commission to Mirzá Sháh Husain Arghún, governor of Tatta, ordering him to take charge of Multán and its neighbouring districts. He accordingly crossed the river near the fort of Bhakkar, and marched tewards Multán with a large army. The wind of the divine wrath began to blow, and a great flood arose. When information of this reached Sultan Mahmud, he trembled. Then he collected all his forces, and advanced to the distance of two days' journey from the city of Multan. He seut Shaikh Bahau-d din Kuraishi. successor to the celebrated Shaikh Baligdu-d din Zakariya (mav God sanctify his sepulchre!), as an ambassador to Mirzá Shill Husain, and appointed Mauláná Bahlol, who was noted for in grace of his elequence, as well as the elegance of his filens or accompany the Shaikh. The Mirzk received them with name lionour, and said that he had come with the view of chastising Sultán Mahmúd, and of visiting Shaikh Baháu-d dín Zakaríyá's tomb. The Mauláná stated that it would suffice if the chastisement of Sultán Mahmúd were effected at a distance, in the same manner as the Prophet had mentally admonished Awais Karn, and that Shaikh Bahán-d dín was already come to his presence, inasmuch as he himself was the representative of Zakaríyá, and that there was therefore no need of his troubling himself to proceed any further. They were, however, unsuccessful in accomplishing the objects of their interview, and returned to the Sultán, who died suddenly in the same night, poisoned, it is said, by Laugar Kháu, one of his slaves. He died A.H. 933, after a reign of twenty-seven years.

Respecting Sullán Husain, son of Sultán Mahmúd of Mullán.

After the death of Sultán Mahmúd, Kawám Khán Langáh and Langar Khán, who were the commanders of Sultán Mahmúd's army, deserted their king, and joined Mirzá Sháh Husain Arghúu, and having met with a kind reception from him, they subsequently took possession of the different towns of Multán in the name of the Mirzá, while the romaining Langáh chiefs, confounded at this intelligence, hastened to Multán, and proclaimed the son of Sultán Mahmúd as king, under the titlo of Sultán Sháh Husain, and read the khutba in his name—though he was but a child. But he was king only in name, for Shaikh Shnjá'u-l Mulk Bukhárí, son-in-law of Sultán Mahmúd, assuming the office of wastr, secured to himself all the regal power.

By the advice of this inexperienced man, they took refuge in the fort, which had scarcely one month's provisions in it; while Mirzá Sháh Husain, deeming the death of Sultán Mahmúd a most convenient opportunity for the conquest of the country, immediately laid siege to the fort.

After a few days, the garrisen finding the provisions of the fort were consumed, and that they were about to perish, came to Shaikh Shujá'u-l Mulk, who was the cause of his country's disasters, and solicited his permission to divide their forces and give the enemy battle, representing at the same time that they had still some vigour left, that their horses were fresh, and that it was not improbable that the gale of victory might incline to their side; and that to remain inactive and beleaguered as they were was expedient only when there was some hope of receiving succour from without,—which was not at all a probable contingency in their case.

The Shaikh did not make any reply, but retiring to a private apartment, he invited the attendance of some of the chiefs, and said, that as the sovereignty of Shah Husain Langah had not as yet been well established, he was afraid, lest most of their men, on making a sally from the fort, should take the opportunity to desert, and join Mirzá Sháh Husain, in hope of receiving a favourable reception, and that the small remnant who had regard for their reputation, and who would make a stand, would be Mauláná Sa'du-lla of Lahore, a learned man of that time, who was in the fort of Multán on this occasion, relates that a few months after the siege had commenced, when all the avenues of the fort were closed by the enemy, and no one was able to enter for the purpose of rendering assistance, or go out for the purpose of escaping his doom (for the attempt was attended with certain destruction), the garrison were at last reduced to such extremities, as to be compelled to consume dogs and cats, which were partaken of with as much avidity as if they had been the choicest goats and lambs. The protection of the fort was committed by Shaikh Shuja'u-l Mulk to the charge of a vagabond, named Jedú, who had times thereard militia of the country under him. That wretch entered all the houses wherever he had the least expectation of finding grain, and plundered them so manufalously, that the people exceedly prayed for Shafeh Shujë od Mullês destroxion.

At lan, the besieged were reliated to so desperate a condition, that they preferred being Alled to a flow death by famine, and they accordingly threw themselves from from the walls of the judicious management of Langar Khán, the country was again populated, and he subsequently turned out the Khwája, with the assistance of the people, and made himself master of the country.

After the death of Bábar, Hnmáyún succeeded to the throne of Hindústán, and bestowed the Panjáb in júgir upon Mirzá Kámrán, who sent a message to Langar Khán requesting his attendance, and on the Khán's waiting upon him at Lahore, he was pleased to eonfor on him the country of Pábal in exchange for Multán. In the end, the King assigned as his residence a place at Lahore, now known by the name of Dáira Langar Khán, which is one of the most celebrated quarters of Lahore. From this time forward Multán again came under the dominion of the Kings of Dehlí. After the death of Mirzá Kámrán, it passed to Sher Khán (Sher Sháh), from Sher Khán to Salím Khán (Islám Sháh), and from him to the officers of His Majesty Akbar, all which changes have been mentioned in their respective places.

MUNTAKHABU-T TAWARIKH;

MULLA 'ABDU-L KADIR BADAUNI'.

This history, by Mulla 'Abdu-l Kádir Mulúk Sháh of Badáún, is called by the author Muntakhabu-t Tawarikh; but many others have compiled works under that title, and the name most frequently given to it in Hindústán is Türikh-i Badáunt.

It is a general history of India from the time of the Ghaznivides to the fortieth year of Akbar; and, in the reign of the latter, it is especially useful, as correcting, by its prevalent tone of censure and disparagement, the fulsome cologium of the Akbarnáma. Despite this systematic depreciation, it has been observed that 'Abdu-l Kádir's narrative conveys a more favourable impression of the character of Akbar than the rhetorical flourishes of the Court journalist. It concludes with lives of the saints, philosophers, physicians, and poets of Akbar's reign.

['Abdu-l Kádir, poetically styled Kádirí, was born at Badáún in 947 or 949 H. His father, whom he lost in 969, was called Shaikh Mulúk Sháh, and was a pupil of the saint Bechú of Sambhal. 'Abdu-l Kádir, or Badáúní as he is familiarly called studied various sciences under the most renowned and pious men of his age, most of whom he enumerates in the third volume of this work. He excelled in music, history, and astronomy:

on account of his beautiful voice he was appointed Court Imám for Wednesdays. Early in life he was introduced to Akbar by Jalál Khán Kúrchí, and for forty years he lived in company with Shaikh Mubárak, and Faizí and Abú-l Fazl, the Shaikh's sons. But there was no real friendship between them, as Badáúní looked upon them as hereties, and his notices of them are couched in bitter sareastic terms.] Badáúní died at the beginning of the seventeenth century. The Tabakát-i Sháh-Jahání gives A.H. 1024 (1615 A.D.) as the year of his death.

Badáíní was a very learned man, and was frequently employed by the Emperor to make translations into Persian from the Arabic and Sanskrit, as in the case of the Mu'jamu-l Buldán, Jámi'u-r Rashidi, and the Ramayana; yet, notwithstanding this employment, for which he acknowledges he received, in one present only, 150 gold mohurs and 10,000 rupees, besides a grant of rent-free land, his distinguished patron receives no favour at his hands. He wrote a work on the Hadis called Bahru-l asmar, and he composed a moral and religious work, entitled Najátu-r Rashid, which he wrote at the suggestion of his friend Nizámu-d dín Ahmad, the historian, and which he must have completed very late in life, because the Muntakhabu-t Tawarikh is mentioned in it. He also informs us that he translated two out of the eighteen sections of the Mahábhárata, and abridged a history of Kashmir, which, under the annals of A.H. 998, is said to have been translated from the original Hindí by Mullá Sháh Muhammad Sháhábádí,2-but apparently not the Rajá-tarangini, for the translation of that work is usually attributed to Mauláná 'Imádu-d dín. According to Professor H. H. Wilson,3 there were frequent remodellings or translations of the same work, but amongst those which he notices he does not mention one by Mullá Sháh Muhammad Sháhábádí.4

about this period, and those of 'Abdu-l Kúdir, probably, among the rest, appear to have been excented under the superintendence of Faizi, the brother of the minister Abú-l Fazl, and he is usually supposed to have been the first Musulmán who applied himself to the language and literature of the Bruhmins; but this seems to be a mistake.

The aversion with which 'Abdu-l Kúdir Badáúní regarded the Emperor and his able ministers arose, as he himself frankly confesses, from his own bigoted attachment to the most bigoted of religions, in which it was apprehended that Akbar, with their aid and countenance, was about to introduce some dangerous innovations.² He acknowledges, however, that he temporized, and never hesitated to make his own religious views subordinate to the primary consideration of self-interest [and it is evident that envy of his fellow-courtiers, and discontent with the amount of favour bestowed upon his own unappreciated merits, were ever present in his mind, and embittered his feelings].

Though the author of the Tärikh-i Badāini professes to derive his information chiefly from the Tärikh-i Mubărak-Shāhi and the Tābakāt-i Akbari,—indeed, in a passage in the Najātu-r Rashīd,³ he calls his work a mere abridgment of the Tabakāt,—yet, contrary to the usual Indian practice, there is much more original matter in it than such a declaration would lead us to suppose, and the whole narrative, even when avowedly taken from his predecessors, is tinged with his peculiar prejudices, of which many traits will be found in the extracts which are subjoined.

The history ends with the beginning of the year 1004 A.H. 1595-6 A.D. ["The book was kept secret, and according to a statement in the Mir-atu-l'alam, it was made public during the reign of Jahángír, who showed his displeasure by disbelieving the statement of Badáúní's children, that they had been uncount of the existence of the book. The Tüzak-i Jahángiri made fortunately says nothing about this circumstance; but Badáúní's work was certainly not known in A.H. 1025, the tenth year of Jahángír's reign, in which year the Ma-àsir-i Rahimi was written, whose author complains of the want of a history beside the Tabakát and the Akbar-náma."]

The author gives the following account of his own work: "The writer, 'Abdu-l-Kádir Mulúk Sháh Badáúní, in obedience to the orders of His Majesty King Akbar, finished the abstract of the history of Kashmír in the year A.H. 999, which, at the request of the same monarch, was translated from Hindí into Persian by one of the learned men of his time; but as I cherished a great love for history from my very childhood, and as it was seldom that my hours were not employed either in the reading or writing some history, I often thought of compiling a brief account of the kings of Dehlí, beginning from the commencement of the Muhammadan rule in India to the present time. * * * But circumstances gave me little opportunity of executing my design, and day after day I encountered numerous obstacles. Moreover, the scantiness of the means of subsistence obliged me to leave my country and friends, and thus the per-· formance of the work was for a time suspended, until my excellent and beloved friend? Nizámu-d dín Ahmad Bakhshí went to Paradise. Excellent as is the history composed by this individual, yet I reflected that some additions could possibly be made to it; and I accordingly commenced to abstract briefly the accounts of some of the great kings of India, from the historical works called Mubárak-Sháhi and Nizámu-t Tawárikh Nizami, sometimes adding my own observations. Great brevity has been observed in the style, and the use of figurative and flowery language throughout avoided. I have named this work Muntakhabu-t Tacarikh. It is hoped that this history, the object of which has been to place upon record the deeds of the great Muhammadan kings, and to furnish the means of transmitting my own reputation to posterity, will rather prove a source of my lasting happiness, than tend to aggravate my misfortunes.

"As it is my intention to write only what is true, I hope that God will forgive me, if I should ever allow myself to descend to the relation of minute and trivial particulars."

At the conclusion, he says that it was at one time his intention to have added a history of Kashmír, Gujarát, Bengal, and Sind, and an account of the wonders of India; but as they had no necessary connexion with the history of the Dehlí Emperors, he changed his determination, and concluded his labours, in the year of the Hijra 1004, and as Nizámu-d dín died in 1003, it would appear that he was only one year employed upon this history. But the preface is not very explicit upon this point, and the meaning must be conjectured.

This is one of the few works which would well repay the labour of translation; but it would require a person to bring to the task a greater degree of knowledge of the Persian language than most Indian histories demand, as well as a thorough acquaintance with contemporary historians; for the author not only uses some uncommon words, but indulges in religious controversies, invectives, eulogiums, dreams, biographies, and details of personal and family history, which interrupt the unity of the narrative, and often render it a difficult matter to restore the broken links of connexion. Nevertheless, it must be confessed, that these digressions are the most interesting portion of his work; for rarely do the other obsequious annalists dare to utter their own sentiments, especially such as would be ungrateful to a royal ear, or to confess their own errors and foibles, as 'Abdu-l Kádir does with so much complacency and indifference. His own extensive knowledge of contemporary history also induces him very often to presume that his reader cannot be ignorant of that with which he himself is so intimately acquainted. He consequently slurs over many facts, or indicates them so obscurely,

The abstract of Indian history, from the Ghaznivide Emperors to Akbar—Akbar's history—and the Biographies of hely and wise men, physicians, and poets—each occupy about one-third of the volume, as will be seen from the subjoined abstract.\(^1\) Almost all the headings have been added on the margin by a copyist, the anthor giving very few, except the names of kings and others whose lives he records; yet these must be of some antiquity, as many copies concur in giving them in the same language and form.

The Tärikh-i Badāini is one of the commonest histories to be met with in India. One of the best copies is in the Asiatic Society's Library. Other good copies are to be found in Banda, Lucknow, Kole, and Patna. [The whole of the work has been published in three volumes in the Bibliotheca Indica, and many passages have been translated by Mr. Blochmann as notes to his edition of the A'in-i Akbari.]

EXTRACTS.

Muhammad Tughlik.

[Text, vol. i. p. 227.] In A.H. 729 Tarmah Shírín¹ the Mughal, brother of Katlagh Khwája Mughal, King of Khurásán, who had on a previous occasion invaded Hindústán, advanced with a largo army to the province of Dehlí. He captured several forts, and committed ravages and massacres from Lahore, Sámána, and Indrí to the confines of Badáún, nor did he retreat till the victorious arms of Islám wero arrayed against him. The Sultán pursued him as far as Kalánor, and leaving Mujíru-d dín Aborjá to dismantle that fortress, he returned towards Dehlí.

At this juncture, it occurred to the Sultán to raise the taxes of the inhabitants of the Doáb ten or twenty per cent., as they had shown thomselves refractory. He instituted also a cattle-tax, and a house-tax, and several other imposts of an oppressive nature, which entirely ruined and desolated the country, and brought its wretched inhabitants to destruction.

Ibráhim, son of Sikandar Lodi.

[Text, vol. i. p. 327.] Ráí Bikramájít, who succeeded his father Ráí Mán Singh in the possession of Gwálior, found himself unable to withstand the royal troops, and was obliged to surrender the lofty edifice of Bádalgarh, one of the forts dependent on Gwálior, and built by Mán Singh. On this occasion, a brazen figure which was worshipped by the Hindús fell into the hands of the Musulmáns, which they sent to Ágra. Sultán Ibráhím forwarded it to Dehlí, and placed it before one of the gates of the city. Ten years before the compilation of this history, in the year 992, it was brought to Fathpúr, where the compiler of this work saw it. Gongs, and bells, and all kinds of implements were subsequently manufactured from the metal of which it was composed. In those days Sultán Ibráhím, entertaining suspicions against his old nobles, fettered and imprisoned most of them, and transported others to various distant places.

. Salim Sháh, son of Sher Sháh Súr.

[Text, vol. i. p. 384.] Salím Sháh,² in the beginning of his reign, issued orders that as the saráis of Sher Sháh were two miles distant from one another, one of similar form should be built between them for the convenience of the public; that a mosque and a reservoir should be attached to them, and that vessels of water and of victuals, cooked and uncooked, should be always kept in readiness for the entertainment of Hindú, as well as Muliammadan, travellers. In one of his orders he directed that all the madad-m'ásh and aima tenures in Hindústán which Sher Sháh had granted, and all the saráis which he had built and

^{1 [&}quot;The cloud cap't tower."] This was also the name of the old fort at Agra, which was evidently within the area of the present one, because Jahangir, at the opening of his memoirs, says, "My father demolished the old fort on the banks of the Jumna, and built a new one." It must, however, have been pretty nearly destroyed before Akbar's time, by the explosion mentioned infra, p. 401.

² The correct name is Islâm Shâh, but some historians style him Salim, and most copies of the Türikh-i Badüüni pervert it still more by giving the name as Islâm. See suprâ, Vol. IV. p. 478.

the gardens he had laid out, should not be alienated, and that no change should be made in their limits. Ho took away from the nobles all the dancing girls maintained in their courts, according to the common practice of India. He also took from them all their elephants, and let none of them retain more than a sorry female, adapted only for carrying baggage.

It was enacted that red tents should be in the exclusive use of the sovereign. He resumed, and placed under the immediate management of the State, the lands enjoyed by the troops, and established pecuniary payments in lieu, according to the rates fixed by Sher Sháh. Circular orders were issued through the proper channels to every district, touching on matters religious, political and fiscal, in all their most minute bearings, and containing rules and regulations, which concerned not only the army, but cultivators, merchants, and persons of other professions, and which were to serve as guides to the officials of the State, whether they were in accordance with the Muhammadan law or not;—a measure which obviated the necessity of referring any of these matters to Kázis or Muftis.

In order that these circular instructions might be fully comprehended, the nobles in command of five, ten or twenty thousand horse, were ordered to assemble every Friday in a large tent, within which was placed, on an clevated chair, a pair of Salím Sháh's slippers, and a quiver full of arrows. They then bowed down before the chair, one by one, according to their respective ranks; first of all the officer in command of the troops, and then the munsif, or amin, and so on; after which, with due respect and obeisance, they took their respective seats, when a secretary coming forward read to them the whole of the circular instructions above referred to, which filled about eighty sheets of paper. Every difficult point then at issue within the province was decided according to their purport. If any of the nobles committed an act in contravention of these orders, it was reported to the King, who forthwith passed orders directing proper punishment to be inflicted on the offender, as well as on his family. These rules were in force till the end of the reign of Salím Sháh, and the compiler of this history witnessed the scene above described, when he was of tender age, that is, in the year 955 A. H., when he accompanied his maternal grandfather (may God extend his grace to him!) to the camp of Faríd Táran, commander of 5000 horse, which was then pitched in the district of Bajwárá, a dependency of Bayána.

In the year 954 or 955 A.H. (God knows which year is correct) Khwaja Wais Sarwani, who was appointed to command the expedition against 'Azam Humáyún, fought with the Níázís on the confines of Dhankot, and was defeated.1 'Azam Humáyún, flushed with this success, pursued the Khwája as far as Sirhind. Salím Sháh despatched a large force against the rebels, and a battle ensued at the same place, in which the Níázís were defeated. Some of their wonicn who were made captives were sent prisoners to Gwálior, and Salím Sháh violated their chastity. He distributed among the vagabonds of his camp the tents, standards, and other spoil of the Níázís which had fallen into his hands, bestowing upon them the titles which were common among the Níázís; such as Saiyid Khán, 'Azam Humáyún, Sháhbáz, etc. He granted them kettle-drums, which were beaten at their respective gates at the stated times. These low persons used to beat their drums aloud, and claim the dignity of the dogs of the celestial sphere. These people, in conformity with the practice of making rounds, which is occasionally observed among the prostitutes of India, went every Friday night to do homage to Salim Sháh, instead of saying their prayers. On their arrival at the palace, the heralds exclaimed, "Oh king, be gracious enough to cast Your Majesty's eyes upon such and such Níází Kháns, who have come to offer up prayers for your health and welfare." This proceeding exceedingly disgusted the Afghans, who were of the same tribe as the King. The Niází titles, and the standards and drums, which were granted to them by Salim Shah, are said by some historians to have been bestowed on them after the first battle. God knows whether this is correct or not. 'Azam Humáyún, who was defeated in the last battle, was never able again to take the field.

The ranks of the Níazís began to be thinned day by day, and they soon dispersed. In the first instance they took refuge with the Ghakars, in the neighbourhood of Rohtás, and then settled themselves in the hills in the vicinity of Kashmír. Salím Sháh, with the view of suppressing for the future the disturbances excited by these insurgents, moved with an overwhelming force, and took up a strong position in the hills to the north of the Panjáb, where, for the purpose of establishing posts, he built five fortresses, called Mánkot, Rashídkot, etc. As he had no friendly disposition towards the Afghans, he forced them, for a period of two years, to bring stones and lime for the building of those fortresses, without paying them a single fulus, or jital. Those who were exempted from this labour were employed against the Ghakars, who resisted strenuously, and with whom they had skirmishes every day. At night the Ghakars prowled about like thieves, and carried away whomsoever they could lay hands on, without distinction of sex and rank, put them in the most rigorous confinement, and then sold them into slavery.

These circumstances sorely afflicted the Afgháns, who felt that they were exposed to every kind of insult, but it was not in the power of any iudividual to lay their grievances before Salím Sháh; until one day, when Sháh Muhammad Farmulí, a noble noted for his hilarity and jocular speeches, who was a special companion of the King, took heart and exclaimed, "O my liege! two nights I dreamt that three bags descended from heaven; one containing ashes; another, gold; and the third, papers; the ashes fell upon the heads of the troops; the gold upon the houses of Hindús; and the papers fell to the lot of the royal treasury." Salím Sháh did not take the allusion ill, and it had the effect of inducing him to promise that he would, on his return to Gwálior, order his accountants to disburse two years' pay to the troops, but his death, which occurred soon afterwards, prevented the fulfilment of this promise.

[Text, vol. i. p. 413.] His real name was Mubariz Khan; but when he ascended the throne, with the accord of the ministers and nobles, he assumed the title of Muhammad 'Adil. The people, however, used to call him 'Adalí, and went so far as to alter the letters of this name and convert it into Andhalí, which means "blind."

Ibráhím Khán, after an unsuccessful action at Khánwa, fled to Bayána, which is a strong fort in a commanding position. Hímún immediately invested it, and skirmishes were of daily occurrence between the contending parties. The fort was well supplied with guns and ammunition, and Ghází Khán, Ibráhím's father, who was in Hindún, used to throw supplies into it by way of the hills to the west of Bayána. Hímún invested the fort for three months, and devastated the whole of the country in the neighbourhood, and my father's library in Basáwar was almost entirely destroyed.

At this time a dreadful famine raged in the eastern provinces, especially in Agra, Bayana and Dehli, so that one sir of the grain called juwari rose to two and a half tankas, and even at that price could not be obtained. Many of the faithful elosed their doors, and died by tens and twenties, and even in greater numbers, and found neither coffin nor grave. Hindús perished in the same numbers. The common people fed upon the seeds of the thorny acaeia, upon dry herbage of the forest, and on the hides of the eattle which the wealthy slaughtered and sold. After a few days, swellings rose on their hands and feet, so that they died, and the date is represented by the words khashm-i izad, "Wrath of God." The author with his own eyes witnessed the fact that men ate their own kind, and the appearance of the famished sufferers was so hideous that one could scarcely look upon them. What with the searcity of rain, the famine and the desolation, and what with uninterrupted warfare for two years, the whole country was a desert, and no husbandmen remained to till the ground. Insurgents also plundered the cities of the Musulmáns.

Amongst the remarkable incidents of the year 962, during the war between Sikandar and Ibráhím, was the explosion in the fort of Agra, of which the following is a brief account. When the army of 'Adali Khán had left Ágra, Ghází Khán Súr sent his own officers with a garrison to protect the property, to keep the fort in a state of preparation, and to lay in provisions, for which purpose they had to examine the several storerooms and workshops. By chance, early one morning, as they were going their rounds with a lamp, a spark fell into a room filled with gunpowder. In the twinkling of an eye it ignited, and rising up to heaven, the earth quaked, so that the inhabitants of the city thought that the Day of Judgment had come, and prayed devoutly when they were roused thus suddenly from their slum-Planks, enormous stones and columns were sent flying several kos to the other side of the Jumna, many people were destroyed, and the limbs of men and of animals were blown away, full ten or twelve miles. As the name of the citadel of Agra was originally called Bádalgarlı, the date, 962, was found in the words A'tash-i Badalgadh-" The fire of Badal."

While Himin was encamped before Bayána, the people died with the word "bread" upon their lips, and while he valued the lives of a hundred thousand men at no more than a barley-corn, he fed his five hundred elephants upon rice, sugar, and butter. The whole world was astounded and disgusted. Himún, once every day, eat with his own followers in public, and calling the Afgháus to his own table, he would invite them to eat, telling them to take up large handfuls, and he would shamefully abuse any one whom he saw eating slowly, and say, "How can you with such a slender appetite expect to fight with any rascally Mughal?" As the Afgháns had now nearly lost their power, they could not muster spirit enough to reply to the unclean infidel; and laying aside the bluntness and hastiness for which they are so celebrated, they consented, whether from fear of consequences or hope of reward, to swallow his foul language like so many sweetmeats, adopting the following verses as their maxim:

"Place not your hands submissively on my feet; Give me only bread, and lay your slipper on my hoad."

REIGN OF AKBAR.

Campaign of Khan-zaman.

[Text, vol. ii. p. 24. Year 964.] [Khán-zamán in these few years, with a small force, fought bravely against the numerous forces of the Afghans, and obtained the victory over them. The history of his campaigns is a bright page in the annals of tho time. At the battle of Lucknow Hasan Khán Bachgotí came up against him with 20,000 men, and Khán-zamán had not altogether more than 3000 or 4000. When the enemy passed the river Karwi and attacked Bahadur Khan, he himself was engaged taking a meal. When he was told that the enemy was at hand, he called for the chess-board and played at his case. Afterwards being told that a foreign army was driving back his forces, he called for his arms. His tents were being plundered, and his whole army was in confusion. He ordered Bahádur Khán to retire; then he, with a few men, beat his drums and fell upon the enemy. He overpowered them, and drove them for seven or eight kos. Many of them were slain, and heaps were formed of the corpses.

So also at Jaunpur he fought with the Gaurian who called himself Sultan Bahadur, and had issued coin and caused the khutha to be read in his name in Bengal. This man advanced against Jaunpur with about 30,000 horse, and the men of Khanzaman were completely routed. When Khanzaman arose from his repast, he found the enemy engaged upon their meal or occupied in plundering. The Khan fell upon them with a small party of men, completely routed the Afghaus, killing many and making many prisoners. He obtained such booty that his army wanted for nothing. The victories which he and his brother achieved could have been accomplished but by few. These two brothers had many noble qualities; but the mark of rebellion was upon them, so that in the end all their exploits came to the dust.

Gicálior and Rantambhor.

[Text, vol. ii. p. 31.1] [In the year 966 the fort of Gwálior was taken. A slave of 'Adali's named Buhail Khán (Suhail), being besieged in the fort, made terms and surrendered the keys. The date was found in the words, Fath báb kil'ah Gwáliár. In this same year another slave of 'Adali's, named Sangrám Khán, sold the fort of Rantambhor into the hands of Surjan Rái Hádá. The facts of the matter are, that shortly before this, when His Majesty took up his abode at Agra, he sent a party of amirs, such as Hindú Beg Mughal, to reduce this fort. These amirs drove Sangrám Khán before them, and ravaged the country round the fortress; but they were unable to accomplish their object.]

Affairs of the Author.

[Text, vol. ii. p. 32.] In AH. 965, I left my home at Besswar, and went to Agra, for the purpose of completing my education.

seeing all that was to be seen, and holding interviews with several holy and learned personages, I crossed the river Ganges, and arrived at Chunár in the month of Zí-l ka'da, A.H. 966.

Jamál Khán sont some of his dependents to meet Mihr 'Alí Beg, and they conducted him to Jamál Khán's house. The palaces of Sher Sháh and Salím Sháh, and all the ammunition and resources of the fort were shown to him, and he was apparently received with the utmost hospitality and kindness.

When the farmán was read, which was intended to conciliate Jamál Khán, by conferring upon him five parganas of Jaunpúr in in'im tenure, in lieu of the fort of Chunár, Jamál Khán showed that he had further expectations, and placed the inest unheard-of difficulties in the way, seeking to delay Mihr'Alí until an answer should be received to the representation which he had made to Court. He insidiously wrote also, at the same time, communications both to Khán-zamán and to Fath Khán Afghán, who was in the fort of Rohtás with a considerable force, helding out to them separately promises of the fort.

When Mihr 'Alí was aware of the perfidy practised by Jamál Khán, and being not without suspicions of the fidelity of Fath Khán, he feared they would league together for his injury, and so he left the fort under pretence of taking an airing, and crossing the river in considerable alarm, proceeded direct to Agra,1 leaving me in the fort. As I thought it best to temporize with Jamál Khán by way of making my own escape, I proposed to him that I should try and bring back Mihr 'Alí, and effect a reconciliation. To this he acceded, and in the evening I got into a boat with the intention of crossing the river. happened that the boat fell into a raging whirlpool under the hill near the wall of the fort, and a fierce wind arose which made the vessel shiver. If the mercy of God, the ruler of earth and water, had not acted as my sail, the bark of my hope would have been dashed to atoms by the whirlpool of calamity against the hill of death.

In the jungle which lies at the foot of the Chunar hills, Shaikh Muhammad Ghaus, one of the greatest saints of India, had resided for twelve years in the practice of asceticism, consuming the leaves and fruits of the forest as his food; and so celebrated was he for the fulfilment of his blessings, that even powerful kings used to come and visit him, and pay their respects. I fell in with one of his dependents, and arrived at the hermitage. He himself was not there, for in this very year he had proceeded from Gujarat to Agra, where he arrived in great pomp and circumstance, accompanied by several disciples, and gave considerable satisfaction to the Emperor by the principles and faith which he professed. * *

Shaikh Gadái, with that spirit of jealousy, spite, and malice which is a peculiar failing of the saints of Hindústún, was vexed at this intrusion of a rival, and looked upon Shaikh Muhammad Ghans as one shopkcoper does on another, who commences the same trade, in the storey directly over his head. Wise men know well the truth of the adage, "Two of a trade never agree." Khán-i khánán, who was much attached to Shaikh Gadáí, did not receive Shaikh Muhammad with that degree of respect and favour which was his due. On the contrary, he assembled divines and learned men, in order to ridicule the treatise of the Shaikh, in which he had said that he had in his waking moments had an interview and conversation with God, who assigned him a superiority over the Prophet Muhammad. He had written other nonsense equally pernicious and blasphemous. He sent also for the Shaikh, and made him the butt of his contumely-so that the Shaikh, much chagrined, retired to Gwálior, where he engaged himself in the pursuits of his holy calling, and contented himself with the proceeds of a jagir, which yielded a kror (of tankas).

[Text, vol. ii. p. 53.] [On 27th Rajab of this year (969 A.H.) my father Mulúk Sháh (may God be mereiful to him!) died in Agra of dysentery. I carried his bier to Basáwar, and there buried him. I found the date of his death in the words Jakon fazl.]

[Text, vol. ii. p. 63.] At the time when the compiler of this work resided at Agra, for the purpose of finishing his education, Shaikh Muhammad Ghaus one day passed by in great state, and accompanied by acclamations which rent the air. He was clothed in the garb of a faktr. I was at first anxious to pay my respects to him; but when I learnt that he was in the habit of rising to receive the salutations of Hindús, that desire vanished, and I was deprived of the satisfaction I had anticipated. Another day, I saw him in the bázár at Agra, with multitudes of people thronging before and behind him, and he was so constantly occupied in returning the salutations of the people on all sides of him, that he could not sit up erect during the whole time of his airing. Although he was eighty years old, his countenance was wonderfully fresh, and his whole appearance betokened anything but old age and debility. The mercy of God be upon him!

[Text, vol. ii. p. 64.] On the 20th of the blessed month Ramazán of this year (970 A.H.) I heard at Sansawán, in Sambal, of the death of my maternal grandfather in Basáwar. Ho had taught mo several sciences, and I was much attached to him. Ho had many claims upon the respect of men of letters. The date of his death is represented by the letters composing the words, Fázil-i Jahán, "The excellent of his time."

Husain Khán Tukriya.

[Text, vol. ii. p. 125.] In A.H. 977 the pargana of Lucknow was transferred from the possession of Husain Khán Kashmírí to that of Mahdí Kásim Khán, who had just returned from Mecca, and had paid his respects to the Emperor at Rantambhor. Husain Khán² was highly indignant at this, and exclaimed,

² This man, of whom some notice has already been taken in the Tabakdt-i Akbari, suprd, p. 468, appears to have been an enthusiast, or a mad man, who could not get over the persuasion that inexhaustible wealth was to be precured, from possessing

"Our friendship is broken, we shall meet no more till the day of judgment." He then abandoned in disgust (his wife) the daughter of Mahdi Kasim, notwithstanding he loved her, and took the daughter of his uncle Ghazanfar Beg. After a while, leaving his wife in distress, and the daughter of Mahdí Khán with her brothers in Khairábád, ho set forth from Lucknow with the design of breaking down the idels and of demolishing the idol temples. For he had heard that their bricks were made of gold and silver, and other false reports of their unbounded treasures had come to his ears. Ho proceeded through Oudh, towards the Siwalik hills.1 The hill-men, as is their custom, abandoned the lower hills after a slight resistance, and fled for security to higher elovations, of which the ascent was very dangerous. Husain Khún arrived at last at the place where Sultán Mahmúd, nephew of Pír Muhammad Khán, was slain. He read the fatiha for the pure spirits of the martyrs who fell there, and repaired their dilapidated tombs. He then ravaged the whole country as far as the kasbah of Wajráil, in the country of Rájá Ranká, a powerful samindár, and from that town to Ajmír, which is his capital. In that place are to be found mines of gold and silver, silks, musk, and all the productions of Tibet, from which country he was only distant two days' journey; -when, on a sudden, as has been frequently observed in those mountains, the neighing of the horses, and the sound of the himself of the mines in the hills. Fivo or six years afterwards, he plundered the Doah, and then made an attack on Basantpur in the hills, where there was a royal garrison, and died from the effects of a gun-shot wound received there. 'Abdu-Khdir, who declares himself a devoted friend and admirer of Husain Khan, says that, though to all appearance he was a fool, he was in reality a very intelligent man. See infrd, p. 503.

1 An impression of the great wealth of Kumāun was generally prevalent about this time. Firishta at the conclusion of his work, in speaking of the native Rājās of Hindustān, says, "The Rājā of Kumāun possesses extensive dominions. A considerable quantity of gold is procured by washing, and copper mines are to be found in the country. The treasures, too, are vast. It is a rule among the Rājās not to encroach upon the hoards of their ancesters; for it is a saying among them, that whoever applies his father's treasures to his own use, will become mean and beggarly in spirit, so that, at the present day, fifty-six distinct treasures exist, which have been left by the Rājās of Kumāun, each with the owner's scal upon it."

kettle-drums, as well as the voices of his followers, caused the clouds to collect, and so much rain fell, that neither corn nor grass was to be procured. Famine stared the army in the face, and although Husain Khán, with the most undaunted intrepidity encouraged his men, and excited their cupidity by representing the wealth of the city and the country, in gold, jewels and treasure, they were too much disheartened to second his resolution, and he was compelled to retreat.

On their retreat the Káfirs, who were in possession of the passes, showered down stones and arrows tipped with poisoned bones upon them. They also blocked up the way, and most of the bravest of his warriors drank the cup of martyrdom. Many of the wounded, who escaped at the time, died five or six months afterwards from the effects of the poison.

Husain Khán returned to Court, and requested that Kánt and Gola? might be conferred upon him in jágír, in lieu of the one he held before. This was graciously acceded to. Several times he made incursions to the foot of the hills with various success, but he was never able to penotrate into the interior. Many fine fellows, who had escaped half-dead from his first expedition, now felt the malarious influence of the climate, and died off, but not in battle. After some years Husain Khán, contrary to the advice and remonstrances of his friends, mustered his forces for a final Tertullian, Eusebius, Jerome, and other Christian nuthors ascribe the miraculous shower to the prayers of the Christian soldiers in the army. Suidas and Die Cassius to a magician. The fact is indisputable; the cause is more probably explained by our Oriental writer. In modern days, it has frequently been observed that severe actions have been followed by rain, and philosophical reasons have been assigned for this curious effect.

struggle to get possession of the hills, and perished in the attempt, as, please God, will be mentioned in its proper place.

About this time I went, after taking leave of Husain Khán, from Lucknow to Badáin, where I formed a suitable nuptial alliance for my brother, Shaikh Muhammad, whom I loved from my very sonl, nay, better than my own soul, for he was endowed with every excellent and angelic quality. Three months did not elapse before he died, he, as well as 'Abdu-l Latíf, the light of my eyes, the earliest fruits of the garden of my life (my first-born), who, when time cast an evil eye upon him, was earried off, in the twinkling of an eye, from the cradle to the tomb, and I was suddenly reduced from the happiest to the saddest of men. God created me, and to God shall I return!

Death of Shaikh Salim Chishti.—The Author wounded.— Conflagration at Badáin.

[Text, vol. ii. p. 136.] In the year 979 A.H. the palace at Agra and the palace at the new town of Fathpur were completed. * * * At the close of the month of Ramazan of this year, Shaikh Salim Chishti, of Fathpur, died. He was one of the chief saints of Hindustan, and his sayings are worthy of commemoration. I will hereafter give a notice of him, please God, in the supplement to this history.

During this year an unfortunate accident befell the author, of which the following are the particulars. At the period when Kant and Gola was held in jágir by Muhammad Husain Khán, and when it pleased fate to associate me with him for some time, as I was appointed Judge of that district, I went on a pilgrimage to Makanpúr, a dependency of Kanauj. where is the tomb of the holy Shaikh, Badi'u-l Hakk wau-d din Sháh Madár (may God sanctify his tomb!). This son of man, through the disposition which he inherited from his sinful and ignorant nature (which he imbibed with his mother's crude milk, and which is the cause of shame and reproach), and through innate darkness and ignorance (which are the source of presumption and baseness, and which came down to him by inheritance from father Adam), the eyes of his wisdom were covered with a film of lust, and he was inclosed in the net of lasciviousness, so that he committed all of a sudden, as was of old forewilled by Providence, a gross impropriety within that shrine. Since the chastisement as well as the mercy of God was upon me, I received upon earth the punishment of my sin, by his ordaining that several connexions of the girl whom I fell in love with should inflict nine sword wounds upon my head, hands, and shoulders. They were all slight, but one penetrated the bone of my skull, and reached to the brain, exposing me as a brainless fellow, and another partially severed the veins of the little finger of my left hand. I fainted away, and appeared to be travelling to another world. May God bless my resurrection!

I met with an excellent surgeon in Bángarmau, who closed my wounds within a week, and in the midst of my pain and illness, I made a vow, that if I recovered I would go to Mecca—a vow which I have not yet been able to perform, but which I hope, God willing, to do before I die, and before any obstacle intervenes to prevent the execution of that excellent resolve. The rest is with God!

Afterwards, I arrived at Kánt and Gola, and had no sooner bathed after my recovery, than I was again laid on my bed by sickness, the wound having become ulcerous from the effect of excessive cold. Husain Khán (may God bless him with eternal Paradise! for he showed himself more than a father or a brother to me) administered some medicine, in the shape of a plaster and electuary, both made from the wood of the tamarisk, and enabled me to proceed on my journey to Badáún. There another surgeon took off the dressings, and re-opened the wound on my head. I was nearly expiring from the intensity of the pain. * * *

immense number of Musulmáns and Hindús perished in the flames. Carts full of the remains of those who were burnt were driven down to the river, and no one could tell who was a believer, and who an infidel. Many who escaped being burnt rushed to the ramparts, and were so scorched by the flames, that men and women precipitated themselves from the wall in despair. Some had their skins burnt and disfigured. Water seemed only to add fuel to the flames. All this I witnessed with my own eyes, and heard the noise of the flames with my own ears. Some it warned, others it destroyed. A short time before this, a half-witted fellow came from the Doáb, whom I took into my own house and society. He said to me one day in private, that I ought to flee out of that city, as some infliction of Providence was about to befall it. But I paid no attention to him, as he was a frequenter of taverns.

Ercction of the fort of Surat, in defiance of the Portuguese infidels.1

[Text, vol. ii. p. 145.] One day in the year 980, the King went to look at the fort of Surat, and gave orders to repair the portions that had been battered and destroyed. During his inspection he saw the large mortars, which had been despatched with a powerful fleet and army by Sulaimán Sultán, the Turkish Emperor, to assist in capturing the harbours of Gujarát, and had been left on the sea-shore, covered with rust, because Sulaimán Ágá, the admiral, had abandoned the enterprise through meeting with some obstacle.² There they remained, until Khudáwand Khán wazir had them carried into the fort of Surat, at the time it was building. The few which remained had been taken to Júnagarh by the Governor. The King inspected them, and gave orders that some of them, which were not wanted there, should be sent to Kgra.²

The reason assigned for Khudawand Khan's building the fort of Surat is, that the Firingis used to oppress the Musulmans in every kind of manner, devastating the country, and tormenting God's servants. At the time of laying the foundations of the fort, they tried to throw every obstacle in the way, by firing cannon from their ships, but all without effect.

That expert engineer laid the foundations of one side within the sea, dug a deep ditch round the two sides which faced the land, and built the walls with stones and burnt bricks. The wall was thirty-five yards long.⁵ The breadth of the four walls was fifteen yards, and their height twenty yards, and the breadth of the ditch was twenty yards. All the stones, the joints and interstices were fastened together with iron clamps, and made firm with molten lead. The battlements and embrasures are lofty, and so beautiful that every one was astonished at beholding them. On the bastions, which projected into the sea, was erected a gallery (ghurfa), which the Firingis, especially the Portuguese, profess to say is an invention of their own. When the Musulmáns began to erect this chaukaudi, the Firingis exerted every kind of opposition to obstruct it; and when they found they could not prevail by force, they offered large sums of money to prevent its being built: but Khudáwand Khán, through the regard which he bore to his own religion, sternly refused, and plied the work till it was finished, in contemptuous defiance of the Christians.

Husain Khán Tukriya.

[Text, vol. ii. p. 151.] In 980 A.H. Husain Khán Mahdí Kásim Khání, jágirdár of Kánt and Gola, had gone off to quell the insurgents of Badáún and Pattiálí, before he heard of Ibráhím Husain Mirzá's arrival in the neighbourhood of Dehlí.² In the mean

¹ It is quite incomprehensible why this building, whatever it was, should have excited so much rancour on both sides. One might suppose it was rather a battery, than a small palace. Literally, it may be said to mean "a four-cornered room." Briggs calls it a four-storied palace. He translates the passage thus:—

"Within the town is a beautiful building, four stories high, which the Hindus call Chowkunda, and the Europeans compare it to a Portuguese palace. Finding they could not prevent by force the construction of the fort, the Portuguese offered large sums of money to induce Khoodabanda Khan not to fortify Surat, but their gold was rejected."—(Briggs, vol. ii., Firishta, vol. iv. p. 147.)

This differs much from the original, which runs thus:-

"The Firingis said, 'If you will not abstain from building the fort, do not, at any rate, build the chaukandi after the model of Portugal; and to secure that, we will pay as much money as we offered to prevent your building the fort.' Ghazanfar Akai Turk, surnamed Khndawand Khan, replied, 'Through the liberality of the Sultan I am in need of nothing; and to show my detestation of you, I shall build this kind of chaukandi, and secure for myself the peculiar blessings which attend good works.' He then sent for the ordnance and other stores, which were called Sulaimani on account of the Turks having abandoned them, and which were then in Júnagarh, and placed them in different parts of the fort of Surat, and strengthened it."—

time, Makhdúmu-l Mulk Mauláná 'Abdu-lla Sultánpúrí and Rájá Bihár Mal, who were entrusted with the chief direction of affairs during the King's absence in Gujarát, wrote to Husain Khán from Fathpúr, to inform him that Ibráhím Husain Mirzá had experienced two defeats, and was then in the vicinity of Dehlí, and that as no person of importance was now present to defend the capital, he ought to hasten to Fathpúr without delay.

He accordingly prepared to obey their summons, and was well on his road, having arrived at the village of Oudh, in Jalesar, when he learnt that the Rájá of Awesar still continued the depredations which he had practised since the accession of the King, in the neighbourhood of Agra, and had become a predatory robber (kassák). He had been engaged in several hard conflicts with some loyal nobles, and had slain many excellent men, and at that time he was concealed in the jungle of the village of Nauráhí, in the pargana of Jalesar.

We had scarcely time to ponder on this intelligence, when all of a sudden, while we were marching at mid-day on the 15th of Ramazán, the men being off their guard, and going on in separate parties, most of them, also, being exhausted with the fast, an attack was made upon us, with matchlocks and arrows. The Rájá of Awesar had formed stages of wicker-work on the tops of the trees, and from this secure position several of our men were killed and wounded. At the very commencement of the attack, a ball struck Husain Khán below the knee, grazed his thigh, and, passing through the saddle, was spent upon the head of his horse. He was very nearly fainting and falling from his saddle, but his self-possession enabled him to keep his seat by clinging to the pommel. I threw water on his face, and his immediate attendants, not aware of the accident, at first thought that his fasting had worn him out. I then seized hold of his bridle, for the purpose of carrying him for safety behind a tree out of the storm of arrows, when he opened his eyes, and, contrary to his usual habit, looked sternly at me, and made signs that there was no need to hold his reins, but that we should dismount and join in the fray. We accordingly alighted, leaving him there to take care of himself.

The contest then raged with fury, and many were killed on both sides. At last, towards evening, victory inclined to our party, which was the smallest, and the infidels were put to flight like so many sheep, but not before our sipáhis were so tired, that they could scarcely wield a sword or shoot an arrow. We had all been so jammed together in the forest, that we could with difficulty tell friend from foe. Some of our men had strength of mind and body enough, to deserve the reward, both of engaging in hely war, and of maintaining a strict fast. I, on the contrary, in my weakness, at last took a cup of water to moisten my throat, for the want of which some poor fellows died. Several excellent friends of mine attained martyrdom in repelling this attack.

After this victory, Husain Khán returned by rapid marches to Kánt and Gola, and strengthened those places. Shortly after, Ibráhím arrived in the pargana of Lakhnor, fifteen kos from Sambal.¹ As Husain Khan was still suffering from the effects of his wound, he was obliged to be carried on a litter, but nevertheless he advanced to Báns Bareillí, in order to force Ibráhím to action, and from Bareillí he made Sambal in one day by a forced march. Ibráhím, alarmed at this exhibition of confidence and courage, thought it better to decline an action, and retreated by way of Amroha, in the environs of Lakhnor, leaving a distance of seven kos between him and his opponent. Had Husain Khán been compelled to fight in his then wounded state, God knows what would have happened! It was one of the Mirzá's mistakes that he did not attack Husain Khán while he was in this weak state.

[Mu'inu-d din Khán Farankhúdi, governor of Sambal, with a large party, and several other amirs and jágirdárs of the neighbourhood, who had taken refuge in the fort, when they heard at midnight the rell of the drums of Husain Khán, they thought the Mirzá was upon them, and were quite overpowered by fear. But when the cry areso that Husain Khán had come to their assistance, they came out joyfully to meet him. Noxt day we went to the abedo of Shaikh Fathu-lla Tarbati, one of the vicars of Shaikhu-l Islám Fathpúrí, and there held a council. It was then considered advisable that all the amirs of the neighbourhood of Dehlí who had turned out against the Mirzá should go with Tolak Khán Korchí and * * to the pargana of Ahár on the Ganges, and there wait for us; then, after the junction of the forces, further operations might be decided on.

Husain Khán exclaimed, "Good God! The Mirzá eamo here with a small party of horso, and although your numbers more than doubled his, you took refuge in the fert of Sambal; and new twenty or thirty amirs and old soldiers with a large force are so dismayed that yeu want to sholter yourselves in the fort of Ahar, which is a more rat's hele. This will encourage the Mirzá to make further attacks upon the Imperial territories. Now there are two courses open, one of which we must follow. You must eross the Ganges, and, under the cover of that old fort, must intercept the Mirzá, and prevent his getting over the Ganges. I will follow up in his rear, and we shall see what will happen. Or I will hasten over the Ganges, and head the Mirzá, while you pursue him. This seems to be our duty." But they could not agree upon any course until Husain Khán, driven by necessity, went off in haste with the horsemen he had to the amirs at Ahar, and inveighed loudly against their going into the fort. He brought them out, and again held a council with them. "The enemy," he said, "is in the heart of the country, and is like a hare in the midst of a camp. If we follow him up sharply, we may settle his business, and take him alive. The glory of this victory will be yours." The soldiers said, "Under the orders of Makhdumu-l Mulk and Rájá Bihár Mal, we have driven the Mirzá out of the Delhí territory, and have come into Sambal. Mu'inu-d din Ahmad Khán is the master and jágírdár of this province, and he is now responsible. Our orders were to protect Dehlí, not to make war upon the Mirzá, for there are risks in such a course."

Intelligence now arrived that the Mirzá had attacked Amroha, and having crossed the Ganges at the ford of Chanbála, was marching rapidly towards Lahore. Husain Khan, convinced of the apathy of the amirs, separated himself from them immediately, and made a forced march to Garh-muktesar, in order to arrest the Mirzá, Of the royal amirs, Turk Subhán Kulí and Farrukh Diwina were the only ones that accompanied him. A letter now reached him from the amirs of Ahue, arging him to come speedily and join them. The Mirzá, like the rook on a cleared chess-board, now came into the heart of the country, plundering and ravaging the towns in his way. When he was at Páyal, his men committed such atrocities upon Musulmán people as cannot well be described. In that town twelve virgins were ravished with such violence that several of them died. Other places fared in the same way. Husain Khan followed the steps of the Mirza, and the amirs came after him; until they reached Sirlind. Here they became refractory, and would go no further. But Husain Khan was not content to remain. With the small force under his command, not exceeding 200 men in all, and with the two persons (above named), he marched rapidly from Sirkind to Lúdiyána. There he learnt that on the Mirzá's approaching Lahore, the garrison had closed the gates against him. Upon this the Mirzá went to Sher-garlı and Jahni.

Husain Kulí Khún, who was besieging Nagarkot and the fort of Kángra, heard of these movements of the Mirzá's; so he patched up a treaty with the Hindús. He received five mans of gold as tributo from the people of Nagarkot, and had the khutba read in His Majesty's name. He then marched away along with Mirzá Yúsuf Khún, Masnad-i 'Alí, Fattu (Katlú) the slave of 'Adalí, Ism'aíl Khún, Rájú Bírbal and other amirs, and proceeded in pursuit to Sankra. When Husain Khán heard of this movement, in that maduess which a thousand times had got the better of his judgment, he swore an eath that he would not eat feed until Husain Kulí joined him. Crossing the Biyáh at the ford of Talwandí, he made a forced march to Sher-garh, one of the dependencies of Jahní. There he paid a visit to Shaikh Dáúd Kádirí Jahní-wál. When food was served, he excused himself from eating on account of his oath. The Shaikh observed that it was easy to atone for an oath, but silly to distress ono's friends. The Khán instantly called for a slave, and having set him free, thus atoned for his oath. Then he partook of the food, and benefited by the gracious words which he heard. He remained there that night. The monastery of the Shaikh provided entertainment for all the party, and his fields furnished grass and corn for the horses.

Three days afterwards I came from Lahore to Sher-garh, and stayed there four days, seeing and hearing things which had never entered into my imagination. I was anxious to withdraw from the world, and to devote myself to the sweeping of the monastery. But the Shaikh would not allow me, and told me I must go to Hindústán. So I took my leave in a very forlorn and distressed state. * * *

One stage from Talwandí, Husain Khán addressed a letter to Husain Kulí Khán, saying that he had come four hundred kos by forced marches, and begging for one day's delay, so that he might join him, and share in the victory to be won. Husain Kulí Khán said, "Very well," and sent the messenger back. On the same day he hastened on to the town of Túlamba, four kos from. Multán, and attacked the Mirzá, who was out hunting, and quite unaware of his approach. Some of the Mirzá's men were preparing to march, and others had dispersed, and were not in condition to fight. Mas'úd Husain Mirzá, younger brother of Mirzá Ibrahim Husain, took the initiative, and attacked the forces of Husain Kulí Khán; but his horse stumbled and fell upon the broken ground, and he was taken prisoner. When Mirzá Ibráhím Husain returned from hunting, all chance was gone; and although he fought well, and made several charges, he was unable to gain any success; so he turned his reins and fled.

The day after the victory Husain Khán arrived at Túlamba, with eighty or ninety men, and drums beating. Husain Kulí Khán showed him the battle-field, and told him of each man's exploits. Husain Khán then said, "As the enemy has escaped alive, you must pursue him and take him prisoner, for the business is not yet completed." Husain Kulí Khán replied that he had come from Nagarkot by forced marches, that his forces had suffered many hardships in that mountainous country, and were not in condition. A complete victory had been secured, and now there was an opportunity for other friends.

Husain Khán now hoped that his turn was come, and that the hardships and the forced march of five hundred kos had opened a way for him, so he took his leave, and pressed forward. Some men, who were worn out with fatigue, he sent to Lahore with the elephants and drums. With a small party of mon he took up the pursuit of the Mirzá. There was but a short distance between him and the unfortunate Mirzá, when one night the Mirzá and about four hundred horsemen halted on the banks of the Biyah and Sutlei, where the rivers unite. The jlill, who are a low class of Multan peasants, having collected together, made a night attack upon him, and assailed him with arrows. The Mirzh, with a party of men, some wounded and some disabled, did what they could to beat off their assailants; but the jhile came on successfully. At length an arrow, guided by fate, struck the Mirzh at the back of his head, and came out through his throat. Unable otherwise to help himself, he changed his clothes, and his men left him. They fled, sorely distressed, in every direction. But wherever they went, they were marks for the arrows of death, and met their fate. One or two old slaves of Mirzá Ibráhím, having dressed him in the garments of a kalandar, were desirous of getting him out of the way of danger. His helplessness was so great that they took him for refuge to the dwelling of a darcesh named Shaikh Zakariya. Outwardly the Shaikh applied cintment to his wounds, but privately he sent information to Saifa Khán at Multán. The Khán sent a slave manel Danka Khán to bring in the Mirzh a prisoner. Sa'id Khan wrote a despatch, and sent it to the Emperor as he was coming to Ajmir on his return from Gujarat.

Husain Khan, when he heard of the capture of the Mirza, hastened to Multán, and saw Sa'id Khán. He made a difficulty about seeing the Mirzá, and said: "If whon I see him, I salute him, it will be inconsistent with my duty to the Emperor, and if I do not salute him, it will be uncourteous, and the Mirzá will say to himself-'See this uncircumcised fellow, who, when he received quarter at the siege of Satwas, made obeisances without end, and now that evil days are fallen upon me treats me cavalierly." The Mirzá heard these ceremonious words of his, and said "Come and see me, and without obeisance, for I waive it." Notwithstanding he made his bow, and saw him. The Mirza, with an anxious look, said, "I had no intention of rebellion and disturbance. When the matter took a serious turn, I took my own course, and threw myself into a foreign country. But they would not allow me to stay there. If it was my fato that this defeat should fall upon me, would to God that I had received it at your hands, that it might have been the cause of the advancement of you, who are my co-religionist, and not from Husain Kulí Khán, who is alien in religion and sect!" Husain Khán then returned to Kánt and Gola, and soon afterwards he heard that the Mirzá had died in prison.

Husain Khán proceeded from Kánt and Gola to Court. Husain Kulí Khán also came to Fathpúr from the Panjáb, bringing Mas'úd Husain Mirzá, with his oyes fastened up, and a number of the Mirzá's mon as prisoners. They were nearly three hundred persons, and they were brought before the Emperor, with skins of asses, hogs, and dogs cast over them, some to be put to death with divers tortures, and some to be set at liberty. * * Sa'íd Khán also sent the head of Mirzá Ibráhím Husain from Multán, having had it cut off for the purpose after his death.]

Sulaimán Kiránt!

[Text, vol. ii. p. 163.] [In this year (980) died Sulaimán Kiráni, ruler of Bengal, who had assumed the title of Hazrat-i ala. He had conquered that mine of infidelity, the city of Katak and Banáras,² and had made Jagannáth a homo of Islám. His authority extended from Kámrú (Kámrúp) to Orissa. His son Báyazíd succeeded him; but in the course of five or six months, the Afgháns put him to death, and his brother Dáúd bin Sulaimán attained the sovereignty.]

Abit-1 First.

[Text, vol. ii. p. 173.] About this time (Zí-l hijja, 981 A.H.), Shaikh Abú-l Fazl, son of Shaikh Mubárak Núgori, the star of whose knowledge and wisdom was brilliant, came to Court, and received many marks of distinction.

Building of Palaces.

[Text, vol. ii. p. 173.] In 981 fine spacious palaces were built on the road to Ajmír. His Majesty's devotion induced him every year to go on a pilgrimage to that city. So directions were given for building a palace at every stage between Agra and Ajmír, and for creeting a pillar and sinking a well at every kos. Some hundreds of thousands of stags' horns, which had been killed in the course of His Majesty's life, were placed upon the pillars as a memorial for the world.³ Would that, instead of these, gardens or saráis had been formed!

Lodi Afghan.4

into prison his amíru-l umará Lodí, who had been ruler of Orissa, but who had since taken a hostile course, and had set himself up in opposition in the fort of Rohtás. He got Lodí into his power by holding out the bribe of an elephant. They tell the story that one day Dáúd went out hunting with a small escort, and that Lodí, with ten thousand horsemen of Sulaimán's, formed the design of putting down Daud. But Daud went back to the city, assembled his forces, and scattered Lodi's followers. By his crafty management, he got Lodí into his power, and appropriated all that he possessed. Lodí, knowing his death to be certain, did not withhold his advice from Dáúd. He said, "Although I know that you will be very sorry after my death, and that you will derive no benefit from it, still I will give you one counsel, which if you act upon you will prove victorious. My advice is, that you place no reliance upon that peace which I effected not long ago by means of two lacs of rupees. The Mughals will never let you alone for this trifling sum. Be beforehand with them, and make war with them immediately, for there is nothing like the first blow." Dáud thought he had an evil design in what he said, and, proud of the hollow peace which he had made with Khán-khánán, but which was no better than a shadow, he put the devoted Lodí to death. Thus he struck his own foot with the axe, and at the same time uprooted the plant of his prosperity with the spade of calamity.]

Building of the fort of Payág.

[Text, vol. ii. p. 176.] On Safar 23rd, A.H. 982, His Majesty arrived at Payág (Prayága), which is commonly called Illáhábás, where the waters of the Ganges and Jumna unite. The infidels consider this a holy place, and with the object of obtaining the rewards which are promised in their creed, of which transmigration is one of the most prominent features, they submit themselves to all kinds of tortures. Some place their brainless heads under saws, others split their deceitful tongues in two, others enter hell by casting themselves down into the deep river from the top of a high tree. Here His Majesty laid the foundations of an Imperial city, which he called Illáhábás.

Translation of the Singhásan Battisi.

[Text, vol. ii. p. 183.] [In Jumáda-l ákhir, while the Court was at Sher-garh, otherwise called Kanauj, a book called Singhdsan Battisi, which is a series of thirty-two tales about Rájá Bikramájít, King of Málwa, and resembles the Túti-náma, was placed in my hands; and I received His Majesty's instructions to make a translation in prose and verse. I was to begin the work at once, and present a sheet of my work on that very day.
A learned brahman was appointed to interpret the book for me.
On the first day I completed a sheet, containing the beginning of the first story, and when I presented it, His Majesty expressed his approbation. When the translation was finished, I called it Khirad-afzá, a name which contains the date of its composition. It was graciously accepted, and placed in the Library.]

Revenue Arrangements.2

[Text, vol. ii. p. 189.] [In this year (982) an order was promulgated for improving the cultivation of the country, and for bettering the condition of the raiyats. All the parganas of the country, whether dry or irrigated, whether in towns or hills, in deserts and jungles, by rivers, reservoirs, or wells, were all to be measured, and every such piece of land as, upon cultivation, would produce one kror of tankas, was to be divided off, and placed under the charge of an officer to be called krori, who was to be selected for his trustworthiness, and whether known or unknown to the revenue clerks and treasurers. So that in the course of three years all the uncultivated land might be brought into cultivation, and the public treasury might bo replenished. Security was taken from each one of these officers. The measurement was begun in the vicinity of Fathpúr. One kror was named Adampúr, another Shethpúr, another Ayhbpur, and so on, according to the names of the various prophets (and patriarchs). (Regulations were circulated, but eventually these regulations were not observed as they ought to have been. A great portion of the country was laid waste through the rapacity of the kroris, the wives and children of the raigats were sold and scattered abread, and everything was thrown into confusion. (But the kroris were brought to account by Rájá Todar Mal, and many good men died from the sovere beatings which were administered, and from the tortures of the rack and pincers.) So many died from protracted confinement in the prisons of the revenue authorities, that there was no need of the executioner or swordsman, and no one cared to find them graves or grave-clothes. |Their condition was like that of the deveut Hindús in the country of Kúmrúp, who, having dedicated themselves to their idol, live for one year in the height of enjoyment, appropriating everything that comes to their hands; but at the end of the period, one by one they go and assemble at the idel temple, and cast themselves under the wheels of its car, or offer up their heads to the idel.

All the country, with the exception of that which was under the khalisa (exchequer), was held in jagir by the amirs. But from the prevalence of indulgence and debauchery, extravagance in household expenditure, and accumulation of riches, there was no means of maintaining the soldiery or of fostering the peasants. When the services of the amirs were required, they came into the field attended only by a few slaves, or some young Mughal soldiers. Able soldiers were nowhere to be found. Shahbaz Khan, the mir-bakhshi, revived the regulations of the dagh (branding), and the mahalli, which were instituted by Sultan 'Alan-d din Khilji, and were afterwards maintained by Sher Shah. It was also settled that every amir should be first appointed commander of a score (bisti). 1 * * * When he brought up the horses of those twenty horsemen for the dágh according to the regulation, he might be promoted to be a sadi (commander of a hundred) or higher.

They were also to keep elephants, horses, and camels suitable to their rank. When they brought this number of horsemen for inspection, they were to be treated according to their deserts and position, and might attain to a mansab of 1000, 2000 or of 5000, than which there is none higher. If they did not do so, they fell from their rank.

But under this regulation also the ill-used soldiers fared worse. For it was found that the amirs, having effected their objects, dressed up many of their dependents (kháss-khailán) and horsemen (bárgir) in the garb of soldiers, and bringing them to the muster, they made up the complement of their mansab, and received jágirs in proportion. Then they dismissed the bárgirs until they required them again, when they would once more enlist, according to their requirements, a number of temporary soldiers, and dismiss them again when no longer wanted.

(The treasure, the collections, and the expenditure of the mansabdárs remained unaltered, but in every way dirt fell into the plate of the poor soldier, so that he was unable to gird up his loins.) Tradesmen, such as weavers, cotton-dressers, carpenters, and Hindú and Musulmán grocers (bakkál) would hire a horse or charger, and bringing it up for the dágh, would obtain a mansab, and would become a krori, ahadi (guardsman), or dákhili (substitute) of some one. A few days afterwards no trace would be found of the hired horse or of the missing charger, and they were reduced to the position of footmen.

There were many men who at the time of the royal inspection at the public office were placed in the scales, bound hand and foot with their garments on, and their weight would reach to two and a half mans or three mans more or less. Afterwards it would be found out that the clothes were hired, and the horse borrowed. His Majesty used to say, "I with my eyes open, and aware of what

1 (Hore follows an unintelligible passage.)

I am about, give something to these men, so that they may have some means of living." After a while they would present themselves again as ahadis of two horses, of one horse, or even of half a horse. For two horsemen would be partners of one horse, and receiving for it the forage allowance, amounting to six rupees, would divide it between them. This sort of trade was carried on to a great extent; but for all this the Emperor's good fortune was so great and flourishing that his enemies were everywhere annihilated, and soldiers were not so much wanted. The amirs also were set free from the unseemly blandishments of the uncircumcised.]

Abu-l Fazl's second introduction to Akbar.

[Text, vol. ii. p. 198.] In 982 Abu-l Fazl, now styled 'Allami or "very learned," came a second time to Court. (He set the world in flames, and "lighted up the lamp of the Sabahis,"-a proverbial way of saying he lighted his lamp by daylight.) In accord with the saying, "He who contends gains his object," he set himself in opposition to all sects, and bound the girdle of reform about his loins. He presented a commentary on the A'yatu-l kursi, which treated on the nice points and subtleties of the Kurán. People say that his father wrote it, but he presented it, and got much praise. The words "tafsir-i Akbari" give the date of its composition. The Emperor received him graciously, and (in order to humiliate the arrogance of the proud mullús) looked upon him more favourably than he did upon me. The reason of Abú-l Fázl's antagonism and rancour was that at the time of the persecution and massacre of heretics like Mír Habshí and others, Shaikh Abdú-n Nabí, Makhdúmu-l Mulk, and the learned in general took counsel together, and with one accord they represented that Shaikh Mubarak Mahdawi also was a heretic, who was lost himself, and led others to perdition. Having got tacit permission to repress and remove him, they sent officers to apprehend him; but as the Shaikh had abscouded with his sons, they broke the pulpit of his mosque. He then sought the protection of Shaikh Salím Chishtí in Fathpúr, who was then at the height of his prosperity and eminence. Shaikh Salim nent him something for his expenses, and recommended him to leave the country, and fly to Gujarát. As he obtained nothing in this quarter, he went to Mirzá 'Aziz Koka, who represented to the King, that Shaikh Muhárak was a learned and indigent man, that his children were clever, that he held no land in in'oim, and inquired what was the advantage of persecuting a worthy man. So the Emperor gave up the intention of hurting him, and in a short time everything went on to his heart's content. Shaikh Abú-l Fazl ingratiated himself with His Majesty by his unremitting devotion to the King's service, by his temporizing disposition, by his duplicity, by his study of the King's temper and this. In the course of the last few years the Emperor had gained in succession many great and remarkable victories, and his dominion had grown in extent from day to day. Not an enemy was left in the world. He had taken a liking for the society of ascetics and the disciples of the celebrated Mu'iniyyah (God rest his soul!). He spent much time in discussing the Word of God and the sayings of the Prophet; and he devoted his attention to questions of Súfism, science, philosophy, law and other matters. He passed whole nights in meditation upon God and upon the modes of addressing him as yá hú and yá hádi. Reverence for the great Giver filled his heart. (In order to show his gratitude for some of his blessings, he would sit many a morning alone in prayer and mortification upon the stone bench of an old cell which lay near the palace in a lonely spot.) Thus engaged in meditation, he gathered the bliss of the early hours of dawn. *

Having completed the building (of the 'ibádat-khána), he made a large hall in each of the four divisions of it. He also finished the construction of the tank called anúptaláo. He called the building 'ibádat-khána, and by degrees it became at last a

.1 On Fridays after prayers he would go from the new khánkáh of the Shaikhu-l Islám, and hold a meeting in this building. Shaikhs, learned and pious men, and a few of his own companions and attendants, were the only people who were invited. Discussions were carried on upon all kinds of instructive and useful topics. * * Every Sabbath evening he invited saiyids, shaikhs, doctors and nobles. But ill feeling arose in the company about the seats and order of precedence, so His Majesty ordered that the nobles should sit on the east side, the saiyids on the west, the 'ulamá on the south, and the shaikhs on the north. His Majesty would go from time to time to these various parties, and converse with them and ascertain their thoughts. Quantities of perfume were used, and large sums of money were distributed obtained an entry through the favour of the Emperor's attendants. Many fine books which had belonged to Itimid Khan Gujarati, and had been acquired in the conquest of Gujarat, were placed in the royal library, but were subsequently brought out and distributed by the Emperor among learned and pious men. Among the rest he gave me a book called Anvairu-I mashkut.* * * One night the vein of the neck of the 'ulama' of the age swelled up, and a great outery and tumult arose. This annoyed His Majesty, and he said to me (Badauni), "In future report any one of the assembly whom you find speaking improperly, and I will have him turned out." I said quietly to Asaf Khun, "According to this, a good many would be expelled." His Majesty asked what I had said. When I told him, he was much amused, and repeated my saying to those who were near him.

He used to summon Makhdúmu-l Mulk Mauláná 'Abdu-lla Sultánpúri to that assembly, in order to annoy him; and he set up to argue against him Hújí Ibráhím and Shaikh Abú-l Fazl, then a new arrival, but now the prime leader of the New Religion and Faith, or rather the infallible guide and expositor de omnibus relus et quibusiam aiiis. His Majesty used to interrupt the Mauláná at every statement, and at a hint from him his companions also would interfere with interjections and observations, and would tell queer stories about the Mauláná, and exemplified in his person the verse of the Kuráu, "And some of you shall have life prolonged to a miserable age."]

The Pilgrimage.

[Text, vol. ii. p. 203.] One night (during the year 983), Khán Jahán mentioned that Makhdúmu-l Mulk had given an opinion that in those days it was not a religious duty to go on a pilgrimage, and that it was even sinful to do so. When he was asked his reasons, he replied, that there were only two ways to Mecca, one by 'Irák, the other by Gujarát. By the former, a man must hear abusive language from the Kazilbáshes (Persian Shi'as); by the lattor, ho must, before he ombarks at sea, suffer the indignity of entering into an ongagement with the Firingís, which engagement was headed and stamped with portraits of the Virgin Mary and Jesus Christ (upon whom be peace!), and so is tinetured with idol worship. ¹ Therefore both ways should be prohibited.

Another device of Makhdumu-l Mulk's was the trick by which he avoided payment of the legal alms due upon his wealth. 2 At the end of each year he used to make over all his property to his wife, but before the year had run out he took it all back again. It was said that he practised some other tricks, of which even the Israelites would have been ashamed. Stories were told, one after another, about his meanness and shabbiness, and baseness and worldliness, and oppression, all which vices were exhibited towards holy and deserving men, especially those of the Panjáb, and which one by one came to light, verifying the saying, "There is a day when secrets shall be disclosed." They told also other stories founded upon his villary, sordid disposition, and contemptible conduct, and they ended by deciding that he ought to be shipped off by force to Mecca. When he was asked if he thought the pilgrimage a duty for himself, he replied in the negative. About this time, Makhdúmu-l Mulk began to fall into discredit, and Shaikh 'Abdu-n Nabí 3 succeeded him in the good graces of the King.

Respecting Makhdumu-l Mulk, an intelligent author, who has written on the subject of Akbar's deflections from the path of the Muhammadan religion, observes:---

² [Or, more familiarly, how he avoided payment of income-tax.]

[&]quot;A learned and pious writer, Makhdumu-l Mnlk, published ahout this time a tract injurious to Shaikh 'Ahdu-n Nabi. He accused that teacher of having heen wrongfully instrumental to the deaths of Khizr Khan Shirwani, who had heen condemned for reviling the Prophet, and 'Ali Habsh, who had been charged with heresy. Rent-free Tenures.

[Text, vol. ii. p. 404.] This year the King gave orders that the rent-free land throughout his dominious, whether in the shape of ayma, maind-m'ash, walf or pensions, should not be considered valid, and that the revenue-officers should not recognize them until the Sale had approved the grants. The consequence was, that the people whose rights were assailed flocked from the farthest east of India, and from Bakkar in the west, to represent their grievances. Whoever found a powerful friend among the nobles and people at Court, secured his wishes, and whoever could not obtain a similar introduction, had to give largo bribes to Saivid 'Abdu-r Rasúl, and all the subordinates of the Shaikh, even to the fará-les, door-keepers, grooms and sweepers, and by these means contrived at last to "save his blanket from the whirlpool." He who could not succeed in procuring either of these passports, was well thrashed and kicked by the attendants; besides which, many of the unfortunates perished from the effect of the hot air in that immense crowd. Although the King knew all these particulars, yet such was his regard for the Sadr, that he could not be persuaded to interfere with his proceedings. Whenever the Sadr sat in state and dignity in the diwinkhana, and held public audience, the nobles would, now and then, taking forward some learned and respectable man, represent his case for consideration. But he used to receive them with little respect, and after much entreaty and importunity, some able man, who could explain the Hidaya, or any equally abstruce book, would get a paltry hundred bighas, more or less, restored to him, and the rest, of which he might have been in possession ndded also, that the Shaikh was unworthy to mount the pulpit, both because he was subject to n bodily infirmity, and because he had been disavowed by his own father for his perverse and undutiful conduct when a youth. To these attacks Shaikh 'Abdu-n Nabi replied by calling Makhdamu-l Mulk a heretic and a fool. Opinions were divided, some of the religious men sided with one, and some with another; the dispute ran high, and a complete schism ensued. The enemies of Islam took this opportunity to augment the King's disgust and dissatisfaction, and those impressions becoming progressively more intense, he lost in the course of five or six years every particle of his original belief."—Oriental Quarterly Magazine, vol. i. p. 51.

for many years, would be resumed. But the ordinary run of ignorant and worthless fellows, even down to Hindús, would get as much land as they asked for, without question. From these proceedings, learning and its professors declined in estimation every day. Even in the middle of the assemblage, while seated "aloft in awful state," if the time for midday prayers came, he would wash his hands, and care not how much water he sprinkled on the faces and clothes of the surrounding nobles and courtiers. They meekly submitted to the indignity, because they knew it was to the advantage of their peor clients, and would bestow upon the Sadr every kind of culogium, compliment, and flattery, to his heart's content, in the hope by this means to secure at last some compensation for the insult. In the time of no former king had any Sadr such extensive powers and jurisdiction.

The Author's Appointments and Emoluments.

[Text, vol. ii. p. 206.] About this time the King appointed me a preacher, and directed me also to undertake the office of marking the royal horses with the brand. I had no fixed salary, but I was told from the first to aet like a mansabdar of twenty in bringing horses to the brand. Shaikh Abú-l Fazl arrived at Court about the same time, so that we were, as was said, loaves out of the same oven. Yet he, beginning his service by marking horses and attending to the mahalli, managed by his intelligence and time-serving qualities to raise himself to a mansab of two thousand, and to the dignity of wazir. But poor I, from my inexperience and simplicity, could not manage to advance myself. I reflected within myself that there were still hopes of securing contentment (that best of possessions!) by means of a madadm'ash, which would enable me to retire from the world, and apply myself to study and devotion, while free from the cares of the world. But even in this I was doomed to be disappointed.

In the month of Shawwal, 983, on my applying for leave of absence, it was refused; but I received a horse with suitable trappings, and a grant of a thousand bighas, which was a mere nothing, being only equal to an allowance for the maintenance of twenty men, but in accordance with the unfriendly disposition of the Sadr and my unlucky fate. It was styled also in the grant a madad-m'ásh. I represented that with this small tenure I eould not afford to be constantly in attendance at Court, to which the King replied, that he would give me presents also during the marches. Shaikh 'Abdu-n Nabí too observed, that no person of my quality had received from him so large a grant of land. As for the presents which I was promised, though twenty-two years have elapsed since my hopes were raised, I have received them but once or twice, and the rest have been coneealed belind the veil of fate. These fine promises were nothing better than a baseless mirage. I have performed services without reward, and undergone restraints, from which I can now be relieved only by the goodness of God.

" Alláhu Akbar."

[Text, vol. ii. p. 210.] [In these days (A.H. 983, A.D. 1575-6) His Majesty asked how it would be if he ordered the words Alláhu Akbar to be engraven on his Imperial seal and stamped upon his coins. Several people said it would be very good. But Hájí Ibráhím objected. He said the phrase had an ambiguous meaning, and that it would be better to substitute the verse of the Kurán, Lazikru Alláhi Akbaru ("To think of God is the greatest thing"), because it was free from ambiguity. His Majesty was not pleased with this, and said it was self-evident that no creature, in the depths of his impotence, could advance any claim to Divinity. He had only looked upon the word as being apposite, and there could be no sense in straining it to such an extent.] 3

¹ [That is, an eleemosynary grant, not a mansab or military tenure indicative of dignity.]

² [The signification usually attached to these words is "God is great"; but the meaning "Akbar is God" may be given to them.]

The Emperor's Heretical Associates.

[Text, vol. ii. p. 211.] [In this year (983) there arrived Hakim Abú-l Fath Gilání, Hakím Humáyún (who subsequently changed his name to Humáyún Kulí, and lastly to Hakím Humám), and Núru-d dín, who as a poet is known under the name of Karári. These three were brothers, and came from Gilan (near the Caspian). The eldest brother, by his subserviency, obtained an extraordinary ascendancy over the Emperor. He flattered him openly, adapted himself to every change in the religious ideas of His Majesty, and pushing forward, he soon became a most intimate friend of Akbar. Soon after there came to Conrt Mulla Muhammad of Yazd, who got the nickname of Yazidi. He attached himself to the Emperor, and concocted the most extravagant consures against the sahába (companions of the Prophet, the peace of God be upon them!). He told extraordinary stories (about them), and tried hard to make the Emperor a shi'a. But this man was soon left behind by Birbal, that bastard, and by Shaikh Abú-l Fazl and Hakím Abú-l They turned the Emperor from the Religion, and made him a perfect sceptic of inspiration, the prophetic office, the miracles and wonders, and the law. They carried matters to such a length that I, the author, could no longer bear them company. The result of all this, as regards each one of them, will be told in its preper place. About the same time, His Majesty ordered Kází Jaláln-d dín and several other learned men to write a commentary upon the Kurán, but they fell to squabbling about it. That scoffer, Dob Chand, Rájá of Manjhola, used to say, that if the cow had not been greatly esteemed by the Almighty, she would not have been mentioned in the first chapter of the Kurán. As history was read from day to day, His Majesty's faith in the Companions of the Prophet began to be shaken, and the breach grow broader. The daily prayers, the fasts, and prophecies were all pronounced delusions as being opposed to sense. L Reason, not revelation, was declared to be the basis of religion.) Enropeans also paid visits to him, and he adopted some of their rationalistic tenets.]

Death of Daud Afghan.

[Text, vol. ii. p. 238.] [In the early part of the engagement, a cannon-ball struck the knee of Junaid, and broke his leg. When the armies closed, defeat fell upon the Afghans. The horse of Dáud stuck fast in the mnd, and Hasan Beg made Dáud prisoner, and carried him to Khán-jahán. The prisoner, being oppressed with thirst, asked for water. They filled his slipper with water, and took it to him. But as he would not drink it, Khán-jahán supplied him with a cupfull from his own canteen, and enabled him to slake his thirst. The Khán was desirous of saving his life, for he was a very handsome man; but the nobles urged that if his life were spared, suspicions might arise as to their loyalty. So he ordered him to be beheaded. His execution was a very clumsy work, for after receiving two chops he was not dead, but suffered great torture. At length his head was ent off. then crammed with grass and anointed with perfumes, and placed in charge of Saiyid 'Abdu-lla Khán.]

Personal to the Author.

[Text, vol. ii. p. 252.] In A.H. 985 the King, after visiting the shrines of the holy saints in the neighbourhood of Dehlí, went towards Pálam on a shooting excursion. At the close of the blessed month Ramazán, news reached me at Rewárí, that at Basáwar a son had been born to me, of which happiness I had been a long time in expectation. On this occasion I presented an offering of a gold ashrafi to the King, and requested he would be good enough to name the child. After reading a prayer, he inquired the name of my father and grandfather. I replied, "Mulúk Sháh was my father, and he was the son of Hámid." He said, "I call your son 'Abdu-l Hádí,"—Hádí being a name which at that time he had, night and day, upon his lips. Notwithstanding that Hásiz Muhammad Amín, the preacher, was constantly citing the seven imáms, urging me in high-flown language not to commit this absurdity, and to invite some learned men to my house to read the whole Kurán, in order to secure a long life to my son, he could not persuade me, and at the end of six months my son died. May God be pleased on his account to pardon me in the day of judgment!

From Rewari I took five menths' leave, and went to Basawar, on account of sundry affairs of consequence, but I unavoidably extended my absence to the period of a year. This unwarranted neglect of duty and the machinations of my enemies made me fall in the King's estimation, and by degrees I was entirely forgotten. To this day even, although eighteen years have since clapsed, I still perform my duty, but am not honoured with an interview; and I can neither go in search of other employ, nor maintain a firm footing in my present position.

Rent-free Tenures.

[Text, vol. ii. p. 254.] Kází 'Alí Baghdádí, grandson of Mír Kází Husain Maibazi, was deputed to the Panjáb to make inquiries respecting the lands held in rent-free tenure, under the name of madad-m'ásh and ayma. He was directed to resume the old tenures, to measure them, and to include them all in one district. (The greatest anomalies had been perpetrated in this department, which were all to be attributed to the perversity of Shaikh 'Abdu-n Nabí and the dishonesty of his subordinates.)

Religious Difficulties.

[Text, vol. ii. p. 255, A.H. 986.] [His Majesty used frequently to go to the 'ibádat-khána, and converse with the 'ulamá and the shaikhs, especially on Sabbath evenings, and would sometimes pass the whole night there. The discussions always turned upon religion, upon its principles, and upon its divarications. The learned doctors used to exercise the sword of their tongues npon each other, and showed great pugnacity and animosity, till the various sects at length took to calling each other infidels and perverts. * * * Innovators and schismatics artfully started their doubts and sophistries, making right appear to be wrong, and wrong to be right. And so His Majesty, who had an excellent understanding, and sought after the truth, but was surrounded by low irreligious persons, to whom he gave his confidence, was plunged into scepticism. Doubt accumulated upon doubt, and the object of his search was lost. (The ramparts of the law and of the true faith were broken down; and, in the course of five or six years, not one trace of Islám was left in him. The state of affairs was changed.)

There were many reasons for this. But as "small things are suggestive of great ones, and fear betrays the culprit," I will only mention a few. Learned men of various kinds and from every country, and professors of many different religions and creeds, assembled at his Court, and were admitted to converge with him. 1 Night and day people did nothing but inquire and investigate. Profound points of science, the subtleties of revelation, the cariosities of history, the wonders of nature, of which large volumes could only give a summary abstract, were ever spoken of. His Majesty collected the opinions of every one, especially of social as were not Muhammadans, retaining whatever he approved of, and referring everything which was against his disposition, and ran counter to his wishes. From his wellest childhee'i to his markeed, and from his markeed to eld age, His Mojesty has passed through the most diverse places, and through all sins if religious prenties and securion beliefs, and his collected everything which people can End in Zooks, with a uleu of selenica peralia so kim and a spirit of inquiry opposed to every Calamitic principle. Thus a fibility based on some elementary principles, amosé fiself on the minor of his lesses, and as the result of all the influences which were drought to losse on His Majesty, there grow, gradually as the outline on a stone, the conviction in his heart that there were sensible men in all religious, and abstentious thinkers, and men endowed with miraculous powers, among all nations. If some true knowledge was thus everywhere to be found, why should truth be confined to one religion, or to a creed like Islam, which was comparatively new, and scarcely a thousand years old? Why should one sect assert what another denies, and why should one claim a preference without having superiority conferred on itself?

Moreover, Samanis¹ and Brahmans managed to get frequent private interviews with His Majesty. As they surpass other learned men in their treatises on morals, and on physical and religious sciences, and reach a high degree in their knowledge of the future, in spiritual power and human perfection, they brought proofs, based on reason and testimony, for the truth of their own, and the fallacies of other religious, and inculcated their doctrines so firmly, and so skilfully represented things as quite self-evident which require consideration, that no man, by expressing his doubts, could now raise a doubt in His Majesty, even if mountains were to erumble to dust, or the heavens were to tear asunder.

Hence His Majesty east aside the Islamitic revelations regarding resurrection, the Day of Judgment, and the details connected with it, as also all ordinances based on the tradition of our Prophet. He listened to every abuse which the courtiers heaped on our glorious and pure faith, which can be so easily followed; and eagerly seizing such opportunities, he showed, in words and gestures, his satisfaction at the treatment which his original religion received at their hands.]

Christian Missionaries.

[Text, vol. ii. p. 260.] In A.H. 986 the missionaries of Europe, who are called Pádrís, and whose chief Pontiff, called Pápá (Pope), promulgates his interpretations for the use of the people, and who issues mandatos that even kings dare not disobey, brought their Gospel to the King's notice, advanced proofs of the Trinity, and affirmed the truth and spread abroad the knowledge of the religion of Jesus. The King ordered Prince Murid to learn a few lessons from the Gospel, and to treat it with all due respect, and Shaikh Abú-l Fazl was directed to translate it. Instead of the inceptive "Bismillah," the following ejaculation was enjoined: "In nomine Jesu Christi," that is, "Oh! then whose name is merciful and bountiful." Shaikh Faizí added to this, "Praise be to God! there is no one like thee—then art he!" The attributes of the abhorred Anti-Christ were ascribed to our hely Prophet by these lying impostors.

Worship of the Sun.

[Text, vol. ii. p. 260.] The accursed Birbal² tried to persuade the King, that since the sun gives light to all, and ripens all grain, fruits and products of the earth, and supports the life of mankind, that luminary should be the object of worship and veneration; that the face should be turned towards the rising, not towards the setting, sun; that man should venerate fire, water, stones and trees, and all natural objects, even down to cows and their dung; that he should adopt the frontal mark and the Brahminical cord. Several wise men at Court confirmed what he said, by representing that the sun was the chief light of the world, and the benefactor of its inhabitants, that it was a friend to kings, and that kings established periods and eras in conformity with its motions. This was the cause of the worship paid to the sun on the Nau-ros Jaláli, and of his being induced to adopt that festival for the celebration of his accession to the throne. Every day he used to put on clothes of that particular colour which accords with that of the regent-planet of the day. He began also, at midnight and at early dawn, to mutter the spells, which the Hindús taught him, for the purpose of subduing the sun to his wishes. He prohibited the slaughter of cows, and the eating of their flesh, because the Hindús devoutly worship them, and esteem their dung as pure. Instead of cows, they sacrifice good men. The reason was also assigned, that physicians have represented their flesh to be productive of sundry kinds of sickness, and to be difficult of digestion.

Abu-l Fazl appointed Superintendent of Fire-temples.

[Text, vol. ii. p. 261.] Fire-worshippers also came from Nausárí in Gujarát, proclaimed the religion of Zardusht as the true one, and declared reverence to fire to be superior to every other kind of worship. They also attracted the King's regard, and taught him the peculiar terms, the ordinances, the rites and ceremonies of the Kaiánians; and at last he directed that the sacred fire should be made over to the charge of Abú-l Fazl, and that after the manner of the Kings of Persia, in whose temples blazed perpetual fires, he should take care it was never extinguished either by night or day,—for that it is one of the signs of God, and one light from among the many lights of his creation.

From his earliest youth, in compliment to his wives, the daughters of the Rájás of Hind, he had within the female apartments continued to burn the hom, which is a ceremony derived from fire-worship; but on the New-year festival of the 25th year after his accession, he prostrated himself both before the sun and before the fire in public, and in the evening the whole Court had to rise up respectfully when the lamps and candles were lighted.

On the festival of the eighth day after the sun's entering Virgo in this year, he came forth to the public audience-chamber with his forehead marked like a Hindú, and he had jewelled strings tied on his wrist by Bráhmans, by way of a blessing. The chiefs and nobles adopted the same practice in imitation of him, and presented on that day pearls and precious stones, suitable to their respective wealth and station. It became the current custom also to wear the rakhi on the wrist, which means an amulet formed out of twisted linen rags. In defiance and contempt of the true faith, every precept which was enjoined by the doctors of other religions, he treated as manifest and decisive. Those of Islam, on the contrary, were esteemed follies, innovations, inventions of indigent beggars, of rebels, and of highway robbers, and those who professed that religion were set down as contemptible idiots. These sentiments had been long growing up in his mind, and ripened gradually into a firm conviction of their truth.

√ Infallibility of the Emperor.¹

[Text, vol. ii. p. 270.] [In the same year (987), a declaration made its appearance, which bore the signatures and seals of Makhdúmu-l Mulk, Shaikh 'Abdu-n Nabí Sadru-s Sudur, Kází Jalálu-d dín Multání, who was Káziu-l Kuzát, of Sadr-i Jahán, the mufti general, of Shaikh Mubárak, the most learned man of the age, and of Ghází Khán Badakhshí, who had no rival in the science of metaphysics. The object of this declaration was to establish the complete superiority of the Imám-i 'ádil (just leader) over the Mujtahid (chief lawyer); and to make his judgment and choice a preponderating authority on divers questions, so that no one could possibly reject (his) commands, oither in religious or political matters, but must by them be self-convinced. * * * I copy the document verbatim.

[Preumble - Citations from the Kuran and the Traditions.] "We have agreed and do decree that the rank of a Sullán-i'ádil (just ruler) is higher in the eyes of God than the rank of a Mujtahid. Further we declare that the Sultan of Islam, the refuge of mankind, the leader of the faithful, the shadow of God in the world - Abú-l Fath Jalálu-d dín Muhammad Akbar Pádsháh-i Ghází (whose kingdom God perpetuate!)—is a most just, wise, and God-fearing King. Therefore, If there be a variance of opinion among the mujtahids upon questions of religion, and His Majesty, in his penetrating understanding and unerring judgment, should incline to one opinion, and give his decree for the benefit of mankind and for the due regulation of the world, we do hereby agree that such a decree is binding on us and on the whole I nation. Further we declare that should His Majesty, in his unerring judgment, issue an order, which is not in opposition to the Kurán, and which is for the benefit of the nation, it shall be binding and imporative on every man. Opposition to it shall involve damnation in the world to come and loss of religion and property in this life. This document has been written with honest intentions, for the glory of God, and the propagation of Islám, and is signed by us, the principal 'ulamá and lawyers, in the month of Rajab, 987 Hijra."

The draft of this document was in the handwriting of Shaikh Mubarak. The others had signed it against their will. But the Shaikh of his own accord added at the bottom that he had most willingly signed his name, for it was a matter which for several years he had been anxiously looking forward to.

After His Majesty had obtained this legal opinion, the road of deciding religious questions was opened, the superiority of the judgment of the Imaim was established, and opposition was rendered impossible. (The legal distinction between lawful and unlawful was set aside, the judgment of the Imaim became paramount over the dogmas of the lawfund Islam was called Taklid) (counterfeit). * * His Majesty had now determined publicly to use the formula, "There is no God but God, and Akbar is God's representative." But as he found that the extravagance of this led to commotions, he restricted the use of it to a few people in the harem.]

Experimental Seclusion of Infants.

[Text, vol. ii. p. 288.] [In this year (989 H.), in order to verify the circumstances of the case (of the man who heard without cars 1), an order was issued that several suckling infants should be kept in a secluded place far from habitations, where they should not hear a word spoken, Well-disciplined nurses were to be placed over them, who were to refrain from giving them any instruction in speaking, so as to test the accuracy of the tradition which says, "Every one that is born is born with an inclination to religion," by ascertaining what religion and sect these infants would incline to, and above all what creed they would repeat. To earry out this order, about twenty sucklings were taken from their mothers for a consideration in money, and were placed in an empty house, which got the name of Dumbhouse. After three or four years the children all eame out dumb, excepting some who died there—thus justifying the name which had been given to the house.]

Of course, peoplo got fictitious names put down, and obtained supplies of wine. It was, in fact, nothing else but a licensed shop for drunkards. Some peoplo even said that pork was used in the manufacture of the wine (but God knows!). Notwithstanding all restrictions, much mischief and trouble arose, and though many peoplo were punished overy day, there was no sufficient cheek. So (the result verified) the saying, "Upset, but do not spill."

The next matter was that the prostitutes of the realm, who had collected at the capital, and could searcely be counted, so large was their number, had a separato quarter assigned to them outside the town, which was ealled Shaitánpúra or Devilsville. A keeper, a deputy (dirogha), and a elerk also were appointed over it, to write down the names of those who resorted to prostitutes, or who took them to their houses. People might indulge in such connexions, provided the toll-collectors were cognizant; but without permission no one was allowed to take daneing-girls to his house. If any well-known courtier wanted to have a virgin, the dárogha made a statement of the fact, and got permission from the Court. * * Drunkenness and folly led to bloodshed, and though some persons were brought to punishment, others walked about proudly and insolently parading their dolinquencies. His Majesty called some of the principal prosti-tutes before him in private, and asked them who had deprived them of their virginity. After getting the names, some of the most renowned and trusty grandees were punished and condemned, and many of them were kept for a long time in confinement.

Another matter was the interdiction of beef, and the declaration of its being defiling. The reason of this was, that from his youth His Majesty had associated with Hindú libertines, and had thus got implanted in his heart a reverence for the cow, which, in their opinion, is a cause of the preservation of the with the army, and another of those who were absent. When my (the author's) name came up, the late Khwája Nizámu-d dín Ahmad, the author of the Tárikh-i Nizámi, with whom I had become acquainted about a year before that time, but who was as friendly as if I had known him a hundred years, in the great kindness and consideration which he showed to all his friends, and to me in particular, caused me to be put down and returned as sick.]

JInnovations.1

[Text, vol. ii. p. 301.] [His Majesty was now (990 H.) firmly convinced that a period of 1000 years from the mission of the Prophet was the extent of the duration of the religion of Islám, and that period was now accomplished. No obstacle remained to promulgating the designs which he secretly held. He was now free from the respect and reverence due to the shaikhs and 'ulamá, and from the deference owing to their authority. To his entire satisfaction, he was able to carry out his project of overturning the dogmas and principles of Islám, to set up his novel, absurd, and dangerous regulations, and to give currency to his own vicious belief.

The first order which he issued was, that the "Era of the Thousand" should be used upon the coins, and that a Tärikh-i Alfi, or history of the thousand years, from the rihlat, or death of the Prophet, should be written. Other extraordinary innovations were devised as political expedients, and such strange orders were given that men's minds got quite perplexed.  Wine was allowed, if required, for strengthening the body, and if prescribed by doctors; but that no strife and disturbance might arise, severe punishments were prescribed for drunkenness, carousals, and rows. For the sake of proper surveillance, His Majesty established a wine-shop near the palace, and put the wife of the porter in charge of it, because she belonged to the wine-selling class. The price of wine was fixed by regulations,

Declaration of Adherence to the Divine Faith.1

[Text, vol. ii. p. 304.] [Ten or twelve years after the commoncement of these changes, matters came to such a pitch that wretches like Mirzá Jání, chief of Tatta, and other apostates, wrote their declarations to the following effect: "I, so and so, son of so and so, have willingly and cheerfully renounced the false and pretended religion of Islám, which I have received from my ancestors, and have joined the Divine Faith (Din-i Iláhi) of Sháh Akbar, and have assented to its fourfold rule of sincerity— (the readiness to) sacrifice wealth and life, honour and religion." These writings—there could be no more effectual letters of damnation—were handed in to the Mujtahid of the new creed (Abú-l Fazl).

Wealth of Makhdumu-l Mulk.

[Text, vol. ii. p. 311.] [Makhdúmu-l Mulk died at Ahmadábád, and in the year 990 Kází 'Alí was sent from Fathpúr to ascertain what property he had left. When he came to Lahore, he found such vast treasures as defied the key of conjecture to open their lock. Several chests of ingots of gold were discovered in his sepulchre, where he had caused them to be buried as corpses. And the wealth which lay open to the eyes of the world was such that none but the Creator could ascertain it. All these bricks of gold, together with his books, which he looked Translation of the Mahá-bhárat.

[Text, vol. ii. p. 320.] In the year 990 His Majesty assembled some learned Hindús, and gave them directions to write an explanation of the Mahá-bhárat, and for several nights he himself devoted his attention to explain the meaning to Nakíb Khán, so that the Khán might sketch out the gist of it in Persian. On a third night, the King sent for me, and desired me to translate the Mahá-bhárat, in conjunction with Nakíb Khán. The consequence was that in three or four months I translated two out of the eighteen sections, at the puerile absurdities of which the eighteen thousand creations may well be amazed. Such injunctions as one never heard of—what not to eat, and a prohibition against turnips! But such is my fate, to be employed on such works. Nevertheless, I console myself with the reflection, that what is predestined must come to pass!

After this, Mullá Shí and Nakíb Khán together accomplished a portion, and another was completed by Sultán Hájí Thánesarí by himself. Shaikh Faizí was then directed to convert the rough translation into elegant prose and verse, but he did not complete more than two sections. The Hájí aforesaid again wrote it,¹ correcting the errors which had appeared in his first translation, and settling the conjectures which he had hazarded. He had revised a hundred sheets, and, nothing being omitted, he was about to give the finishing touch, when the order was received for his dismissal, and he was sent to Bakar. He now resides in his own city (Thánesar). Most of the scholars who were employed upon this translation are now with the Kauravas and Pándavas. May those who survive be saved by the mercy of God, and may their repentance be accepted!

The translation was called Rasm-nama, and when fairly en-

Houses of Charity.

[Text, vol. ii. p. 324.] In A.H. 991 the King crected two buildings outside the city where he might feed fakirs, both Musulmán and Hindú; one he called Khairpúra, the other Dharmpura. Some of Abu-l Fazl's people had the charge, and used to spend the King's money in procuring food. As the jogts also used to flock there in great numbers, a separate receivinghouse was built for them, and called Jogipura. Nightly meetings were held in private with some of these men, and they used to employ themselves in various follies and extravagancies, in contemplations, gostures, addresses, abstractions and reveries, and in alchemy, fascination and magic. The King himself studied alchemy, and used to exhibit the gold which he made. One night in the year, called Shiv-rát, was appointed for a grand assembly of jogis from all parts of the country, on which occasion he would eat and drink with the best of them; and used to be gratified by their assurances of a life three or four times longer than the natural life of man.

Ram Chand Bhath.

[Text, vol. ii. p. 335.] [The Emperor stayed four months at Alláhábád, and from thence he sent Zain Khán Koka and Bírbal, who was formerly in the service of Rájá Rám Chand Bhath, on an embassy to Chaurágarh. Rám Chand consented to do homage, and after attending to the duties of hospitality, he detained Zain Khán, and proceeded along with him to Fathpúr, to wait upon the Emperor. He presented a most valuable tribute of one hundred rubies and other precious stones. The value of one of the rubies exceeded 50,000 rupees. He left his son Bábú in attendance on His Majesty, but the young man soon obtained leave to return home. Soon afterwards he went to his last home in the hottest hell. This Rám Chand has left no equal behind him for princely generosity. Among his other gifts, he gave a kror of gold (kror zar) to the minstrel Mán Tán Sen in one day. The Mían did not wish to leave the Rájá, but a gnardsman was sent to bring him back.]

Translation of the Ramayana.

[Text, vol. ii. p. 336.] [In this year the King commanded me to make a translation of the Rámáyana, a composition superior to the Mahá-bhárat. It contains 25,000 shloks, and each shlok is a verse of sixty-five letters. The hero of its story is Rám Chand, King of the city of Audh, who is also called Rám, and whom the Hindús worship as a god in human form.]

[Text, vol. ii. p. 366.] [In the month of Jumáda-l awwal a.H. 999, I completed the translation of the Rámáyan, having occupied four years in the work. When I presented the book, it was greatly praised.]

Anniversary of the Coronation.

[Text, vol. ii. p. 342.] In A.H. 903 the King held the featival of the anniversary of his coronation, according to the practice established in olden time, during which the King received entertainment from every shopkeeper, and appropriate presents from the nobles, so that even fool, scents, and the profits of dateers and fiddlers were entited away into the treasury. From a ministration of 5100 to a humble footman, all had to present offerings; and even I, this powerless arem, the was held in to Rájá Todar Mal.

[Text, vol. ii. p. 365. Thirty-third Year.] [Kalij Khán now returned from Gujarát, bringing various offerings, and an order was issued associating him with Rájá Todar Mal in the administration of the Civil and Rovenue business. The Rájá was now grown feeble and senile, and one night an enemy in ambush inflicted a superficial wound upon him with a sword.]

The Author's Lands.

[Text, vol. ii. p. 368.] In A.H. 996 the King called to mind something about the book which I was then translating, and directed Hakim Abú-l Fath to give me a horse, a shawl, and some other presents. He then observed to Shah Fathu-lla 'Azdu-d daulah, that the whole of Basáwar had been granted to him in jägir, with all its ayma land, and that as I, a native of Badáún, had thus lost my madad-m'ásh land, His Majesty had conferred upon me some of equal value in Badáún, in lieu of it. Shah Fathu-lla then presented in a bag an offering of 1000 rupees, which, by exactions and other most oppressive means, his agents had recovered from the wretched widows and orphans of Basawar; and upon his representing that his officers had collected this surplus from the ayma lands (fraudulently alienated from the public rent-roll), the King told him to retain the money for himself. Three months after this the Shah died, and when my farmán was engrossed, I took leave for a year, went first to Basáwar, and then to Badáún, from which place I wished to make a journey to Gujarát, to see Mirzá Nizámu-d dín Ahmad, but delays occurred to prevent my carrying this intention into effect.

Rajá of Kumáun.

[Text, vol. ii. p. 365.] In A.H. 996, the Rájá of Kumáún arrived at Lahore from the Siwálik hills, for the purpose of paying his respects. Neither he nor his ancestors (the curse of God on them!) could ever have expected to speak face to face with an Emperor. He brought several rare presents, and amongst them a Tibet cow and a musk-deer, which latter died on the road from the effect of the heat. I saw it with my own eyes, and it had the appearance of a fox. Two small tusks projected from the mouth, and, instead of horns, it had a slight elevation, or bump. As the hind quarters of the animal were enveloped in a cloth, I could not examine the whole body. They said that there were men in those hills, who had feathers and wings, and who could fly, and they spoke of a mango-tree in that country which yields fruit all the year round. God knows whether this is true!

The Emperor's Illness.

[Text, vol. ii. p. 376.] [In this year the Emperor was somewhat indisposed. He had pains in his atomach, and other disturbances which no one could account for. Through this inability to understand his ailment, auspicious arising from malevolence were set upon the eldest prince, and whispers of poison flew about.]

The Collage.

[Text, vol. ii. p. 850.] [Among the ediets issued (in the thirty-seventh year of the reign, was one that all the distance and distance bearing the desires of firmer kings should be maked and sold for the price of the gold and eliver, so that not a trace of them should remain in the world. The various salesque and rupees of the Emperor's coinage, whether old or recent, were at once to be put in circulation, and no difference whatever between them and the old coins was to be recognized. Kalij Khán endeavoured to enforce this order. Sarráß were every day called up; bonds were taken from them, and fines were inflicted on them. As a last resource, some were put to death. But for all this they did not refrain from counterfeiting the coin (kallábi). Orders and instructions upon this subject were written and sent to the most remote parts of the dominions, but without effect, until Khwája Shamsu-d dín Khwáfi, the diwán, succeeded in putting all these orders in force.

Shaikh 'Abdu-n Nabi.

[Text, vol. iii. p. 79.] Shaikh 'Abdu-n Nabí, Sadru-s Sudur, was son of Shaikh Ahmad, son of Shaikh Abdu-l Kudús, of Gangoh. He went several times to Mecca and Medina, and studied the traditions. * * * He put on the appearance of great piety. When he was appointed to the Sadúrat, he distributed among the people an immense quantity of madad-m'ásh, walf, and pensions. No Sadr during any former reign had so much power, and no one gave away one-tenth of the walf which he did. The King was for some time so intimate and unceremonious

It is quite impossible to reconcile this culogy with the taunting and aerimonious tone adopted at p. 521; nor does any conceivable variety in the reading of the two texts admit of any essential difference of sentiment; unless, indeed, we consider that the grasping Sadr was Makhdúmu-I Mulk, and not Shaikh 'Abdu-n Nabi; which appears opposed to the whole tenor of the text, and especially to 'Abdu-n Nabi's declaration at the close of the Extract. It is scarcely permitted us to imagine that so grave an author might possibly be indulging in a little playful irony.

The duties and responsibilities of the Sadr resembled those of a Chancellor, or an Ecclesiastical Registrar; the chief difference being, that when the Sadr, as we have seen to be frequently the case, plundered the property of helpless widows and orphans, he was flayed alive, or trodden to death by elephants. As such punishments would be esteemed barbarous in modern times, and as our tortuous system of law generally delights to exercise its sophistries and subtilties in behalf of notorious criminals, there can be little doubt that, if any Sadr were in these days to prostitute the sacred obligations of his office to such infernal purposes, he would escape with impunity:— at least upon earth.

Committunt eadem diverso crimina fato; Ille crucem pretium sceleris tulit, hic diadema. with him, that he would rise to adjust the Shaikh's slippers when he took his leave. At last, through the enmity of Makhdunu-l Mulk and some other ill-disposed and deceitful doctors, he fell in the King's estimation, and began to be treated very differently. The chief reason of the change was this:—

At the time that the King arrived at Fathpur from Banswara, Kází 'Abdu-r Rahím, of Muttra, complained to the Shaikh that a rich and obstinate Brahman had taken all the materials, which he had collected for the building of a mosque, and applied them to his own purposes in building a temple for an idol, and that when he remonstrated with him, the Brahman, in the presence of a multitude of people (may his mouth be crammed with mud!), applied foul aud abusive language to the Prophet (the peace of God rest with him!), and grossly reviled all Musulmáns. When the Bráhman was summoned before the Shaikh, he refused to come, so Shaikh Abú-l Fazl was sent to bring him. Shaikh Abú-l Fazl on his return represented what he had heard from the people of Muttra; namely, that the Bráhman certainly had used foul language. Upon this, the learned in the law decided, some of them for death, some for public exposure and fine. They were consequently divided into two parties, and disputed at great length on the subject. Although the Shaikh went to ask for leave to punish him capitally, the King would give no distinct reply, but said vaguely, that the Shaikh was himself responsible for earrying into execution the sentence of the law, and inquired why he consulted him. During this long suspense the Bráhman coutinued in prison, and notwithstanding that the ladies of the royal household used their exertions to get him released, yet out of regard to the Shaikh, the King would not give his consent.

The Shaikh continued to importune the King for a reply, but all he could get was, that he had already expressed his opinion, and the Shaikh knew what it was. When the Shaikh return to his home, he immediately issued orders for the Brahm death. When the King learnt this, he was very angry.

lading within, and the Madda without, the pulses, exclaimed, u to this the man whom you have proposed and becoured, and has be remoted to much a fitch of heatings as not to regard grain whiles, and to fact a riner to death for the more prichose of diaphyling the payer and authority P" They continued to pour and the complaints into the core of the King, so that he could un langur andura than, * * * One alght, at Auto-table, a conolive of Alyling assembled, Rom whom he bignized their aphilian on the authorice * * The King of host aleghol invoice, and add, " When alwely and also ophilous are in throne of a sentence of double, and a hundredth he flavour of acquittale do you think it right that the says aloud ask upon the latter. The King's agitation was so great that his hair stood on end, like that of a remod tion, and some people behind me whispered that I should not carry the controversy any further. All of a sudden, he carried towards me and said, "You are not at all right," I from which I made a low bow, and retired to a little distance. From that day I have abandoned my presumptions and controversial manney and take my place apart from the groups which surround the throne. It is only now and then that I venture to alterney, and make my obeisance at a respectful distance.

It was on this account that Shalkh Abdust Kabi's prosperity declined, * * * We died in the year DD.

As an author, he was sometimes serious, sometimes formed conceited, proud, and malevolent. He was tall of hypocrist, malignity, dissimulation, ambition, arrogance, and egotism. In his obstinacy and animosity he revited the earlier and later Khalifus and disciples, the ancesters and descendants of the Prophet, the wise and the excellent, the pions and the saintly, and, in short, all Musulmáns in general, and radiouled the principles of their faith, privately and publicly, by night and by day. His conduct was so abominable, that even down, Christiana, Hindús, Sabians, and Gnobres are considered a thousand those less edious. He acted entirely against the tenets of the Muhantemadan religion. What was forbidden in that, was lawful to blue, and vice versa.

He composed a commontary upon the Kurán, consisting entirely of letters without discritical points, in order to abilitarate his infamy, but the waters of a hundred occurs will never cleanse the stain he has contracted, until the day of judgment. He composed it in the very height of the drankenness and impurity, and dogs were allowed to tread on every letter of it. In the same spirit of pride, stubbernness, and infibility, he met his final doom, and in a manner which I trust no one may again see, or hear of; for when the King paid him a visit on his death-bed, he barked at his face like a dog, as the King himself acknowledged in public; his whole face was swellen, and his lips appeared black, incomuch that the King observer—Ahū, Fazl, "What is this blackness? "No," replied Abú-l Fazl, "it is the stain of the blood which he has been spitting." In truth, even this scene was but a small retribution for the blasphemies of which he had been guilty, and for the contumelies which he had uttered against the Prophet, the last of the apostles (the peace of God be upon him, and all his family!). Several abusive chronograms were written on the occasion, of which the following are only a few. * *

He had composed poetry for forty years, correct enough in point of versification and language, but utterly destitute of beauty, either in sentiment or religion.² He has joined the dry bones together pretty well, but the skeleton has no brains. The condiments of verse are sufficiently abundant, but quite tasteless, * * * as is proved by no one remembering his lines, although the very vilest poets meet with some quoters and admirers. Nevertheless, he wrote, what with diváns and masnavis, more than twenty thousand lines, and, notwithstanding that he expended the rich revenues of his jágir upon their transcription, and in sending copies to his friends, far and near, not one of them ever read his poems twice. The following verses of his own selection were given by him to Nizámu-d dín Ahmad and others, as a memento. * * * * Pray tell me what beauty there is in them!

At the time that Shaikh Faizi had gone to take charge of his office of the deputyship of the Dakhin, I wrote him two letters from the foot of the Kashmir hills, and informed him of the cause of the King's displeasure and his refusal to allow me to pay my respects. Upon this he wrote to the King a letter of recommendation, which was couched in the following words, and despatched it, on the 10th of Jumáda-l awwal, A.H. 1000, from

² This is by no means the general estimate of his poetry, which is greatly admired in India, even to this day. [The sense of the text is accurately preserved here, but the translation is somewhat amplified.—ED.]

Ahmadnagar to Lahore, and orders were given to Abú-l Fazl to place it in the Akbar-nama, so that it might be generally read.

"May it please Your Majesty! Two friends of Mullá 'Abdu-l Kádir have arrived from Badáún in great distress and sorrow, representing that the Mullá has been for some time ill, and that in consequence of his failing to perform the promise which he made respecting his return, the servants of the government have treated him with great severity, and that there is no knowing what the result of it may be. They inquired also if the prolonged illness of the Mullá was known to Your Majesty.

"Healer of the broken-hearted! Mullá Abdu-l Kádir is a very able man, and is well acquainted with all the sciences usually cultivated by the Mullas of Hindústan, and he was also a pupil of my father's. Your slave has been acquainted with him for nearly thirty-seven years. Besides being a person of deep learning, he is a poet, and composes elegantly in Arabic and Persian. He is not a mere imitator, but an original thinker. He also knows a little of Hindú astrology and accounts, and is not at a loss in any field of knowledge. He is acquainted with foreign, as well as with native music, and can play at both the small and big games of chess; moreover, he writes a pretty good Notwithstanding that he possesses all these accomplishments, he is content and entirely divested of avarice, of equable temperament, and a person of excellent morals and manners, but poor, and with no fixed income. He is sincere and warmhearted, and has every confidence in Your Majesty's kindness.

"At the time that the army was before Kombhalmír, he volunteered to join it. There he did the State good service, and received a donation for his wounds. Jalál Khán Korchí, when he first introduced him at Court, said, 'I have brought a preacher to present to Your Majesty, that Your Majesty may be gratified.' Mír Fathu-lla also represented something respecting the Mullá's circumstances, and my worthy brother, Abú-l Fazl, also knows him well. But according to the proverb, 'A grain of good luck is better than a sack full of skill.'

"As the Court is the abode of the virtuous, I have taken the liberty to bring this destitute person to notice, and to place him before the foot of the throne, as if I was myself present. Did I not advocate his claims at this time, I should consider myself guilty of an offence against the cause of truth and justice.

"May God, the omnipotont, place the slaves of the Court under the heavenly shadow of your royal Majesty! and may he mercifully make their feet firm in pursuing the path of rectitude and justice, and in acquiring the knowledge of truth! May he preserve Your Majesty as the protector and neurisher of the helpless, the bestower of mercy, the pardoner of errors, throughout the world and all worlds, and bless you with thousands upon thousands of sources of wealth, abundance, grandeur and felicity, upon earth and in heaven! I implore all this for the sake of the pure spirits who surround the throne of grace, and the saints upon earth who join in the matutinal chorus of prayer. Amen, Amen,"

Should any one, upon perusing this, observe, that Shaikh Faizi's regard and affection for me, which is evidenced by this letter, is but ill requited by the harshness and severity with which I have spoken of him, especially after his death, when the precept of "speak not ill of the dead" should be strictly observed, I have only to reply, that the observation is perfectly just, but under the circumstances, I inquire, what could I do? seeing that the truth of religion and the maintenance of one's faith aro paramount to all other obligations, and that the maxim I never deviate from is, that my love and hatred should be subservient to God's cause. Although I was Shaikh Faizi's companion for forty years, nevertheless, after he apostatized from his religion, changed his manners, and entered on vain controversies, I became gradually estranged from him, and, especially after what occurred at his death, I hold myself no longer his friend. When we are all summoned before the throne of God, we shall receive sentence according to our deserts!

exquisitely copied with, what may be said to be, even unnecessary care and expense. Most of them were autographs of the respective authors, or at least copied by their contemporaries. They were all transferred to the King's Library, after being catalogued and numbered in three different sections. The first included Poetry, Mcdicine, Astrology, and Music; the second, Philosophy, Súfyism, Astronomy, and Geometry; and the third or lowest grade, included Commentaries, Traditions, Theology, and Law. There were also 101 different copies of his poem, Nal-Daman.

NOTE A.

On the capture of Nasibin by means of Scorpions.

The Nasibin, mentioned in the text (suprà, p. 152), is the Nisibis of classical authors, the position of which, on the frontier of the Persian and Roman Empires, made its occupation of so much importance in the estimation of the contending parties, from the time that Lucullus plundered it, till its capture by the Arabs, when it continued as frequent a source of contention between them and the Greeks as between them and the Porsians at a later period. It was surrounded by a treble inclosure of brick walls defended by a deep ditch, and was considered so impregnable that Asiatics, as will be presently seen, are fend of reserting to supernatural means to account for its capture. Saper made three separate attacks upon the town a.d. 338, 346, 350, and the disappointed meansch, after urging his attacks above sixty, eighty, and a hundred days, was repulsed each time with loss and ignominy; but it was at last ceded to him by Jovian in 363, and it remained honceforth with Mannert says the town is called Nisibin, or Nissabin, but neither mode of orthography is consistent with Abu-l Fidu. Vide Geogr. d. Aboulf. texto Arabe, p. 283.

² Gibbon, Decline and Fall, vol. iii. p. 139.

In speaking of this humiliating treaty, Eutropius gives us a good notion of the pelitical honesty of the Romans, by censuring Jovian for not immediately breaking the treaty, and renewing the war, as the Romans had done on all former occasions, immediately he had escaped from the dangerous position which had compelled him to conclude it.—Mistor. Rom. Breviar., x. 17. The capitulation of Closter-Seven, during the Seven Years' War, for a suspension of arms in the north of Germany, the Persians (if we except two short intervals), as it had remained for the two provious centuries with the Romans, a strong bulwark against hostile encroachments.

On the third occasion of Sapor's attack, unusual means were resorted to, to obtain possession of the place. At the stated season of the melting of the snows in Armenia, the course of the river Mygdonius was, by the labour of the Persians, stopped below the town, and the waters were confined on every side by solid mounds of earth. On this artificial lake, a fleet of armed vessels, filled with soldiers and heavy engines of war, was launched, and the accumulated pressure of the waters made a portion of the walls give way. Nevertheless, the monarch failed of success, and Nisibis retained its character as an inexpugnable stronghold.

Under one of his predecessors, Sapor I., the Sháhpúr of the Persians, Mirkhond informs us that a miracle placed the town in the hands of the Persian Monarch. Wearied with the siege, Sháhpúr commanded his army to unite in supplication to the Supreme Being for its conquest, and while they were imploring the aid of heaven, the wall fell down before them, and their faith and devotion received a signal reward.²

Nisibis is now but a small and insignificant place, with scarcely more than one hundred houses, but it is surrounded with ruins which attest its former magnificence.³

The facts above related, with reference to the many obstinate defences of Nasibin, show how natural it was that a credulous Oriental writer should resort to the marvellous to account for such unusual success as attended the arms of the Arabs in the seventeenth year of the Hijri.

The passage against which the captious opponent of 'Abdu-1 Kádir took exception runs thus in the Táríkh-i Alfi, in the Annals of the seventh year after the death of Muhammad. Very few of the Arabic historians notice the circumstance recorded in it, nor do Ockley, Gibbon, or Marigny mention it.'

"The army of Islâm sat eight months before the fort of Nasibín. Now, in and around that city, there were exceedingly large black secrpions, and no man who was bitten by them escaped with his life. The Arab General consequently gave orders that a thousand small jars should be filled with these reptiles, inclosed in loose mould around them, and that they should be thrown at night into the city by the engines. As the jars broke when they fell on the ground, the secrpions crawled out, and killed every one whom they stung. In the morning the garrison were so dispirited, and found themselves reduced to such extremities, that they could no longer hold the fort. The Musulmáns, taking advantage of their consternation, made a sudden assault, broke open the gates, and slew several who had escaped the venom of the secrpions. It is said that in the time of Noshírwán, the fort of Nasíbín was captured in precisely the same way."

If we concur with the objector, and hesitate to receive this narrative as true, we may perhaps be able to explain it in some other more rational manner. In the first place, it may occur to us as not altogether improbable, that this story owes its origin to the use of the propelling machine called the "Scorpion," which we learn from Vegetius² was so called, because it threw small javelins with fine points which occasioned death. Others say because the darts were poisoned.³

Pitiscus, Lexicon Antiquitatum Romanorum, in which the classical references are full, and Basil Faber, Thesaurus Eruditionis Scholastica, v. Scorpio. In Grose's Antiquities, vol. i. p. 16, there is a diagram. Meyrick's Antient Armour, vol. ii. p. 157, shows that a kind of cannon was also called a scorpion, called by the English a hand-cannon. The annals of Placentia for 1444 have "scorpione seu balistra." The quotations given do not bear out the fact of the scorpion being used solely for guapowder. It

Later writers may have copied the statement, and put an interpretation upon it suited to their own comprehensions. It is to be observed that the Scorpion was used, even in Europe, as late as 1428 A.D.¹

There seems to be another way of accounting for this improbable story, if we reject the literal meaning of the words, by supposing that a combustible composition, formed of some bituminous substances, was used upon the occasion. We know from several excellent authorities, that for many years before the invention of gunpowder, such substances were used in warfare, and, what is still more remarkable, that the cases in which they were enveloped were known by the name of Scorpions. Casiri2 gives us the following extract from an Egyptian Geographer, called Shahabu-d dín,3 who flourished about A.D. 1250. "Bodies, in the form of Scorpions, bound round, and filled with nitrous powder, glide along, making a gentle noise, then they explode, and throw out flames.4 But there are others which, cast into the air, stretch along like a cloud, roaring horribly as thunder roars, and on all sides vomiting out flames, they burst, and burn, and reduce to cinders whatever comes in their way." It is also a very curious coincidence, that the ancient Indian weapon, or rocket, called sataghni, with the etymological meaning of the hundred-slaver, should also signify a Scorpion.6

As there will be occasion again to allude to the early use of gunpowder in the East, there is no need to dwell upon this passage from the Egyptian author with any reference to that subject. It is merely adduced here, to show the undoubted use at an early period of a combustible called a Scorpion.

Now, it is remarkable that Dion Cassius, in speaking of the expedition of Alexander Severus against Atra, which was close to may have been the old scorpio. In the Glossary he contradicts himself by scorpion is a "poisoned arrow"; but under scorpionarius, it is shown that hand-weapon, as it is used by one man only.

Nisibis, says that, in the last extremity, the Atreni defended themselves by throwing naphtha both upon the besiegers and upon their engines, by which they were burnt and destroyed. According to Price, naphtha was discharged in pots at Khwárizm.²

Three hundred years before this, the same author tells us, that when Lucullus was besieging Tigranocerta, not fifty miles ³ from Nisibis, "the barbarians" defended themselves by throwing naphtha balls against the engines. "This substance is bituminous, and so inflammable that it burns to ashes everything on which it impinges, nor is it easily extinguished by anything wet."

Nor can we wonder that these noxious implements "fed with naphtha and asphaltus" should have been so frequently and so early used in Mesopotamia; for from the Persian Gulf to the Euxine, from the Dead Sea, where asphaltum floats on the water, to Bákú on the Caspian, where naphtha streams spontaneously through the surface of the soil, and where a boiling lake emits constant flames, the whole country is impregnated with bituminous matter, which is especially abundant on the banks of the Tigris and Euphrates —so that if the Scorpions alluded to by 'Abdu-l Kádir were combustible, there would be no great improbability in the narrative.

But if we reject these solutions as too elaborate and remote, we must fall back upon the literal interpretation, and, improbable as it is, there are many reasons to encourage us to maintain that it is strictly true.

In the first place, the application of living scorpions to such an improbable purpose would not be altogether a novel stratagem. The Táríkh-i Yamíní tells us, that Khalaf defended himself in the fort of Ark 1 by throwing from his catapults wallets of snakes upon the besieging army.

M. de Sacy,² in abstracting the passage from the translation of Jarbádkháni, says, "ils lançoient sur les troupes de Hossain des cruches remplies de scorpions et de reptiles venimeux." For this I can find no authority in the original; but Rashídu-d dín also says in his Jámi'u-t Tawáríkh, that scorpions, as well as snakes, were used upon the occasion. At folio 8 of his History of Sultán Mahmúd we read: "When Khalaf had borne down the 'riders of crocodiles' (nihang-sawar) and the footmen, he continued to harass the besiegers with crafty arts and stratagems. Wherever they established themselves, he, with slings and catapults, cast upon them pots full of snakes and scorpions, and their places of security he converted into places of ambush." 3

Abú-1 Fidá, Mírkhond, and the Tabakát-i Násirí have nothing on the subject.

Cornelius Nepos and Justin inform us, that by means precisely similar Hannibal dispersed the superior fleet of Eumenes:

"Imperavit (Hannibal) quam plurimas venenatas serpentes vivas colligi, easque in vasa fictilia conjici. Harum cum confecisset magnam multitudinem, die ipso, quo facturus erat navale prælium, classiarios convocat, hisque præcipit, omnes ut in unam Eumenis regis concurrant navem, a cæteris tantum satis habeant se defendere: id facile illos serpentium multitudine consecuturos." 4

Then again we find the Atreni, noticed above, making use of this very mode of defence against the troops of the Roman Emperor. Herodian says ¹ (and Gibbon ² has declared his account of this reign to be rational and moderate, and consistent with the general history of the age), "They cast upon them large birds and poisonous animals ³ which fluttered before their eyes, and penetrated every part of their bodies that was exposed," ² ² ³ "so that more perished by these means than by direct attacks of the enemy." ⁴

Frontinus also speaks of this mode of warfare in his book of stratagems; ⁵ and we read of something like it being practised by the Soanes, a people of Colchis, near Caucasus, who endeavoured to suffocate, with poisonous exhalations, those enemies, with whom they could not contend in close combat; ⁶ this was done at Nice in the first Crusade, and again at Antioch. ⁷ At the sieges of Jotopata and Jerusalem, dead bodies of men and horses were thrown by the war-machines on the besieged.1

Moreover, we know from unquestionable testimony, that scorpions abound so much in the neighbourhood of Nasíbín as to be the object of special remark by Oriental Geographers.

Istakhrí, or the author translated by Ouseley, speaking of Kurdan, closo to Nasíbín, says, "It produces deadly scorpions; and the hill on which it stands abounds in serpents, whose stings occasion death." Abú-l Fidá, quoting Azízí, says, "At Nasíbín there is an abundance of white roses, but a red rose is not to be seen. There are also deadly scorpions." Edrísí also notices, in his geographical work, the deadly scorpions of Nasibin.

Taking, therefore, into consideration these concurrent testimonies to the fact of venemous reptiles being sometimes used in warfare, and to their abundance in the vicinity of Nasíbín, we may pronounce in favour of 'Abdú-l Kádir and his Arab authorities, and declare him justified in exclaiming, "that he had not been guilty of any fabrication, that he had seen the anecdote in books, and had written accordingly; and that, as the accuracy of his statement has been fully verified, he is, by God's grace, relieved from the charge of invention."

On Kusdár.

A passage in the Táríkh-i Alfi, which speaks of Kusdár being "near the dominions of Násiru-d dín Subuktigin," would seem to imply that Kusdár was a city of India, and it is so called by Abú-l Fidá and Kazwíní. The compiler of the Táríkh-i Alfi copies the whole of his narrative, with only a few verbal alterations, from the Rauzatu-s Safá, but the first clause is an addition of his own, from which it appears that Kusdar was by him thought to be the first city conquored in India; but as it was so romote from Jaipal's possessions, it does not seem probable that its capture could have inspired him with such fear for his own safety as the text represents. nor is it proper at any period to place the borders of India so far to the west.1 The last instance of its being mentioned as a portion of India is where, in the second part of the Táj'u-l Ma-ásir, it is said tohave been included in the dominion of Shamsu-d din after his capture of Bhakkar. The name of this town is so differently spelt by different authors that it is not often easy to recognize it in its various disguises. Its position is sufficiently indicated by the Táríkh-i Yamíní,2 which, speaking of a period subsequent to that noticed in the text, tells us that when Mahmud thought it necessary to chastise the Governor of Kusdár, because he would not pay his tribute, he gave out that he was going on an expedition to Hirát. and had marched as far as Bust on that route, in order to disguise his intention, when he suddenly turned off towards Kusdár, and came so unexpectedly upon it, that the rebellious Governor came out and supplicated for pardon, and was reinstated after paving a considerable fine, as a penalty for his disobedience.

Kusdár lies to the south of Bust, and is the present Khuzdar of our maps, the capital of Jhálawán in Bilúchistán. It is spelt both and sádik according to Abú-I Fidá, but both he and Sádik Isfahání prefer the former. The latter, however, is the most usual mode of spelling it.

Von Hammer i says that Wilken is correct in writing it Kasdár, but this is by no means authorized by either of the two Geographers mentioned above. Súdik Isfahání spells it Kisdár, and Abú-l Fidá Kusdár, and to his authority we must defer, as he is so very

When Ibn Haukal visited the valley of Sind, he found Kusdár under a separato government; and during the whole period of Arab occupation it was considered a place of importance. He describes it as a city and district between Túrán and Sind. Kusdár is frequently mentioned by Biládurí. He quotes an Arabic poet, who thus rapturously speaks of its merits.

"Almonder has descended into his tomb at Kusdár, deprived of all commerce with people endowed with reason.

"What a beautiful country is Kusdár! how distinguished its inhabitants! and how illustrious both for his worldly policy as well as his religious duties was the man who now lies buried in its soil!"

On Fire-worship in Upper India.

Nizámu-d dín Almad mentions no other event of Ibráhím's reign but the following: "The Sultán turned his face towards Hindústín, and conquered many towns and forts, and amongst them was a city exceedingly populous, inhabited by a tribe of Khurásání descent, whom Afrásiyáb had expelled from their native country.  It was so completely reduced by the power and perseverance of the Sultán, that ho took away no less than 100,000 captives." Abú-l Fidá and tho Tabakát-i Násirí are silent. The Táríkh-i Alfí says, "Ibráhím next marched against Derápúr in Hindústán, a place which many great emperors found it impracticable to conquer. Several histories state that this place was inhabited by the descendants of the people of Khurásán, who for their disloyal and rebellious conduct had been long before banished the country by Afrásiyáb, Emperer of Turán." The Muntakhabu-t Tawarikh has nothing more on the subject than is contained in the Tabakát-i Akbari. The Rauzatu-s Safá is the same as the Türlkh-i Alfi, except that the fermer omits the name of the place. Firishta adds a few particulars not to be found in the others. He says:-"The King marched from thence to another town in the neighbourhood, called Derá, the inhabitants of which came originally from Khurásán, and were banished thither with their families by Afrasiyab, for frequent robollions. Here they had formed themselves into a small independent state, and, being cut off from intercourse with their neighbours by a belt of mountains nearly impassable, had preserved their ancient customs and rites by not intermarrying with any other people. The King, having with infinite labour cleared a road for his army over the mountains, advanced towards Derá, which was well fortified. This place was remarkable for a fine lake of water about one parasang and a half in circumforence, the waters of which did not apparently diminish, either from the heat of the weather or from being used by the army. At this place the King was overtaken by the rainy season; and his army, though greatly distressed, was compolled to remain before it for three months. But as seen as the rains abated, he summoned the town to surrender and acknowledge the faith. Sultán Ibráhim's proposal being rejected, he renewed the siege, which continued some weeks, with great slaughter on both sides. The town, at length, was taken by assault, and the Muhammadans found in it much wealth, and 100,000 persons, whom they carried in bonds to Ghazni. Some time after, the King accidentally saw one of those unhappy men carrying a heavy stone, with great difficulty and labour, to a palace which he was then building. This exciting his pity, he commanded the prisoner to throw it down and leave it there, at the same time giving him his liberty. This stone happened to be on the public read, and proved troublesome to passengers, but as the King's rigid enforcement of his commands was universally known, no one attempted to touch it. A courtier one day having stumbled with his herse over the stone, took occasion to mention it to the King, intimating that he thought it would be advisable to have it removed. To which the King replied, 'I commanded it to be thrown down and left there; and there it must remain as a monument of the calamities of war, and to commemorate my sense of its evils. It is better for a king to be pertinacious in the support even of an inadvertent command than that he should depart from his royal word.' The stone accordingly remained where it was; and was shown as a curiosity in the reign of Sultán Bairám several years afterwards."

The position of this place is very difficult to fix. Firishta says that in the year 472 u. Ibrahim marched in person to India, and conquered portions of it never before visited by the Musulmáns. Ho extended his conquests to Ajodhan, now called Pattan Shaikh Farid Shakr Ganj. Ho then went to Rúdpál, situated on the summit of a steep hill, which a river embraced on three sides, and which was protected by an impervious wood, infested by serpents. He then marched to Derá, which Briggs seems to place in the valley of the Indus, because he adds in a note, "Derá seems a common name in the vicinity of Multán for a town." The reading of the Táríkh-i Alfi with respect to the two first places is much the most probable, —namely, a fort in the country of Júd¹ and Damál.

The Rauzatu-s Safa does not mention the first place, and speaks of the second as if it were on the sea-shore. The third place he does not name. In Firishta it is Derá, and in the Táríkh-i Alfi Derápúr. This would seem to be the place called Derabend, near Torbela, on the Upper Indus.² It is possible that the Dehrá of Dehrá Dún may be meant; but, though the belt of mountains, the inaccessible jungle, the seclusion of the inhabitants, and the identity of name, are in favour of this supposition, we are at a loss for the inexhaustible lake and the impregnability of the position.

All the authors, however, who mention the circumstance, whether they give the name or not, notice that the inhabitants were banished

Putting aside the probability, which has frequently been speculated upon, of an original connexion between the Hindú religion and the worship of fire,¹ and the derivation of the name of Magadha from the Magi, there is much in the practical worship of the Hindús, such as the hom, the gáyatrí, the address to the sun² at the time of ablution, the prohibition against insulting that luminary by indecent gestures,³—all which would lead an inattentive observer to conclude the two religions to bear a very close resemblance to one another. It is this consideration which should make us very careful in receiving the statements of the early Muhammadan writers on this subject; and the use of the word Gabr, to signify not only, especially, a fire-worshipper, but, generally, an infidel of any denomination, adds to the probability of confusion and inaccuracy.⁴

Khusrú, in the Khazáinu-l Futúh (p. 76), calls the sun the kibla of the Hindús, and it is quite evident that throughout his works Gabr is used as equivalent to Hindú. In one passage he speaks of the Gabrs as worshippers both of stones and fire.

European scholars have not been sufficiently attentive to this double use of the word, and all those who have relied upon M. Petis ^{4 &}quot;A Christian is called amongst them Gower, that is, unbelcever and uncleane, esteeming all to be infidels and pagans which do not believe as they do, in their false, filthic prophets, Mahomet and Murtezalli."—A. Jenkins, Hakluyt, vol. i. p. 391.

³ Hesiod enables us to disguise it in a learned language,

de la Croix's translation of Sharafu-d dín, have considered that, at the period of Tímúr's invasion, fire-worship prevailed most extensively in Upper India, because Gabr is used throughout by the historians of that invasion to represent the holders of a creed opposed to his own, and against which his rancour and cruelty were unsparingly directed. There is distinct mention in the Matla'u-s Sa'dain of fire-worshippers, as distinct from the Hindús; and the Kashmirians, according to Firishta, were fire-worshippers at the time of the Muhammadan invasion. The men of Deogír are called fire-worshippers in the Táríkh-i'Aldí.

But though the word is used indiscriminately, there are certain passages in which it is impossible to consider that any other class but fire-worshippers is meant. Thus, it is distinctly stated in Tímúr's Memoirs, and by Sharafu-d dín, that the people of Tughlikpúr ² believed in the two principles of good and evil in the universe, and acknowledged Ahrimán and Yezdan (Ormuzd). The captives massacred at Lioni ³ are said to have been Magians, as well as Hindús, and Sharafu-d dín states that the son of Safi the Gabr threw himself into the fire, which he worshipped.¹

We cannot refuse our assent to this distinct evidence of the existence of fire-worshippers in Upper India as late as the invasion of Tímúr, A.D. 1398-9. There is, therefore, no improbability that the independent tribe which had been expelled by Afrásiyáb, and practised their own peculiar rites, and whom Ibráhím the Ghaznivide attacked in A.D. 1079, were a colony of fire-worshippers from Irán, who, if the date assigned be true, must have left their native country before the reforms effected in the national creed by Zoroaster.

Indeed, when we consider the constant intercourse which had prevailed from the oldest time between Persia and India,5 it is surprising that we do not find more unquestionable instances of the persecuted fire-worshippers seeking an asylum in Northern India as well as in Gujarát. The instances in which they are alluded to before this invasion of Tímúr are very rare, and almost always so obscurely mentioned as to leave some doubt in the mind whether foreign ignorance of native customs and religious rites may not have given a colour to the narrative.

The evidence of the Chinese traveller, Hinen-thsang, to the existence of sun-worship at Multan in 640 A.D., is very decisive. He found there a "temple of the sun, and an ideal erected to represent that grand luminary," with dwellings for the priests, and reservoirs for ablution; 1 yet he says the city was inhabited chiefly by men of the Brahmanical religion. A few centuries before, if Philostratus is to be believed, Apollonius, after crossing the Indus, visited the temple of the sun at Taxila, and Phraotes, the chief of the country, describes the Indians as in a moment of joy "snatching terches from the altar of the sun," and mentions that he himself never drank wine except "when sacrificing to the sun." After crossing the Hyphasis, Apollonius goes to a place, which would seem to represent Jwala Mukhi, where they "worship fire" and "sing hymns in honour of the sun." When the Arabs arrived in the valley of the Indus, they found the same temple, the same idol, the same dwellings, the same reservoirs, as had struck the Chinese, but their description of the idol would lead us to suppose that it was a representation of Budh. Birúní, however, whose testimony is more valuable than that of all other Muhammadans, as he was fully acquainted with the religious system of the Hindus, plainly tells us 3 that the idol of Multán was called Aditya,4 because it was consecrated to the sun, and that Muhammad bin Kásim, the first invader, suspended a piece of cow's flesh from its neck, in order to show his contempt of the superstition of the Indians, and to disgust them with this double insult to the dearest objects of their veneration.1

Shortly before Biruni wrote, we have another instance of this tendency to combine the two worships. In the message which Jaipúl sent to Núsiru-d dín, in order to dissuade him from driving the Indians to desperation, he is represented to say, according to the Táríkh-i Alfi: "The Indians are accustomed to pile their property, wealth, and precious jewels in one heap, and to kindle it with the fire, which they worship. Then they kill their women and children, and with nothing left in the world they rush to their last onslaught, and die in the field of battle, so that for their victorious enemies the only spoil is dust and ashes." The declaration is a curious one in the mouth of a Hindú, but may perhaps be considered to indicate the existence of a modified form of pyrolatry in the beginning of the eleventh century. The practice alluded to is nothing more than the Jauhar, which is so frequently practised by Hindús in despair, and was not unknown to the nations of antiquity. palus performed it, on the capture of Babylon. "He raised a large pyre in his palace, threw upon it all his wealth in gold, silver, and royal robes, and then placing his concubines and eunuchs on it, he, they, and the entire palace were consumed in the flames."2 The Saguntines did the same, when their city was taken by Hannibal;3 Juba also had prepared for a Jauhar, and Arrian gives us an account of one performed by the Bráhmans, without noticing it as a practice exclusively observed by that class.5 The peculiarity of the relation consists in Jaipal's declaration that the Indians worshipped the fire, . not in the fact of their throwing their property and valuables into it. The practice of self-cremation also appears to have been common at

Strabo correctly observes, on the authority of Megasthenes, that suicide is not one of the dogmas of Indian philosophy; indeed, it is attended by many spiritual penalties:3 and even penauce which endangers life is prohibited.4 There is a kind of exception, however, in favour of suicide by fire and water,3 but then only when age, or infirmity, makes life grievous and burdensome. The former has of late years gone quite out of fashion, but it is evident that in ancient times there were many devotees ready to sacrifice themselves in that mode.

It was, therefore, a habit anticiently common amongst the Indians of that early period, to make Lasan remark upon it as a positive glory of that nation. All this, however, may have occurred without any reference to fire as an object of worship; but the speech of Jaipal, if not attributed to him merely through Muhammadan ignorance, shows an unquestionable devetion to that worship.

But to continue, Istakhri, writing a century earlier than this transaction, says, "Some parts of Hind and Sind belong to Galars. but a greater portion to Kafira and idolaters; a minute description of these places would, therefore, be unnecessary and unprofitable." Here, evidently, the fire-worshippers are alluded to as a distinct class; and these statements, written at different periods respecting the religious creeds of the Indians, seem calculated to import a further degree of credibility to the specific assertions of Shansfurd din, Khondamír, and the other historians of Timur's expedition to India. But the people alluded to by them need not have been colonies of refugees, fleeing from Muhammadan bigotry and persecution. There are other modes of necounting for their existence in these parts. They may have been Imbian converts to the doctrine of Zoroaster, for we read that not only had he seemt communication with the Brahmans of India, but when his religion was fully established, he endcayoured to gain propalytea in India, and succeeded in convorting a hearned Brahman, called Tohongajghatchah by Anquetil du Perron, who returned to his native country with a great number of pricate. Firdust tolls us that Infaultyar' induced the monarch of India to renounce idolatry and adopt fire worship, insomuch that not a Bráhman remained in the idol-temples A few centuries afterwards, we have indisputable testimony to the general spread of these doctrines in Kábul and the Panjáb. The emblems of the Mithraio worship so predominate on the coins of the Kanerkis, as to leave no doubt upon the mind that it was the state-religion of that dynasty.

Ritter entertains the supposition, that as the Khiljí family came from the highlands which afforded a shelter to this persecuted race, they may have had a leaning to these doctrines, and he offers a suggestion, that the new religion which 'Aláu-d dín wished to promulgate may have been that of Zoroaster, and that this will account for the Panjáb and the Doáb being full of his votaries at the time of Tímúr's invasion. But this is a very improbable supposition, and he has laid too much stress upon the use of the word Gabr, which, if taken in the exclusive sense adopted by him, would show not only that these tracts were entirely occupied by fire-worshippers, but that Hindús were to be found in very few places in either-of them.

After this time, we find little notice of the prevalence of fireworship in Northern India; and its observers must then have been exterminated, or they must have shortly after been absorbed into some of the lower Hindú communities. Badáúní, however, mentions the destruction of fire-altars one hundred years later by Sultán Sikandar in A.H. 910. It may not be foreign to this part of the inquiry to remark, that Abú-l Fazl speaks of the Gubree language as being one of the thirteen used in the súba of Kábul (Aín-i Akbarí, vol. ii. p. 1263). The Gubree language is also mentioned in Bábar. There is a "Gubber" hill and pass not far from Bunnoo, inhabited by the Battani tribe; and on the remotest borders of Rohilkhand, just under the hills, there is a tribe called

There is another inferior Hindú tribe, to the west of the upper Jumna, and in the neighbourhood of the Tughlikpúr mentioned above, who, having the name of Magh,² and proclaiming themselves of foreign extraction (inasmuch as they are descendants of Rájá Mukhtesar, a Sarsutí Bráhman, King of Mecca, and maternal grandfather of Muhammad !!),³ would seem to invite the attention of any

It is true that Gabri now stands for fire-worshippers, but that is only because they assumed to themselves this title, which belonged to another order of their ancestors. The word is derived from gabh, a smith, and ir, sacred, meaning the sacred smiths, and Cabiri being only a perversion of it, is of course in substance of the very same import. * * * Gobhan Sacr means the sacred poet, or the Freemason Sage, one of the Guebhres, or Cabiri."—Round Towers of Ireland, pp. 354, 386. ³ See Quatremère's observations in the Journal des Savants, January, 1851. This is not at all an uncommon paternity for the lower tribes to assume. There is nothing in which Hindú ignorance is more betrayed, than in these silly attempts to entol the false prophet amongst their native heroes. See especially Wilford's absurd and dirty story, showing how Muhammad was of Brahmanical descent. (As. Res. vol. ix. p. 160.) Wilson considers that the story was manufactured especially for Wilford, but it is traditionally current among the ignorant in some parts of Upper India. (Note to Mill's India, vol. ii. p. 176.) The reputed Brahmanical origin of Akbar is more reasoninquirer after the remnant of the stock of Magians; but all their customs, both religious and social, are of the Hindú stamp, and their only peculiarity consists in being the sole caste employed in the cultivation of mendhi (Lawsonia inermis).

Note D.

On the knowledge of Sanskrit by Muhammadans.

It is a common error to suppose that Faizi (v. p. 479) was the first Muhammadan who mastered the difficulties of the Sanskrit,—that language, "of wonderful structure, more perfect than Greek, more copious than Latin, and more exquisitely refined than either."

Akbar's freedom from religious bigotry, his ardent desire for the cultivation of knowledge, and his encouragement of every kind of able, inasmuch as it can be attributed to gratitude, and is not opposed to the doctrine of transmigration; but why Muhammad should also be chosen, whose votaries have proved the most unrelenting persecutors of Hindús, can only be ascribed to the marvellous assimilating powers of their mental digestion, fostered by the grossest credulity and ignorance of past events, which can, as Milton says, "corporeal to incorporeal turn," and to that indiscriminate eraving after adaptation, which induces them even now to present their offerings at the shrines of Muhammadans, whose only title to saint is derived from the fact of their having despatched hundreds of infidel and accursed Hindús to the nethermost pit of Hell.

learning, and especially his regard for his Hindú subjects, imparted a stimulus to the cultivation of Indian literature, such as had never prevailed under any of his predecessors. Hence, besides Faizí, wo have amongst the Sanskrit translators of his reign 'Abdu-l Kúdir, Nakíb Khán, Mullá Sháh Muhammad, Mullá Shabrí, Sultán Húji, Hájí Ibráhím, and others. In some instances it may admit of doubt, whether the translations may not have been made from versions previously done into Hindí, oral or written. The word Hindí is ambiguous when used by a Muhammadan of that period. Nizámu-d din Ahmad, for instance, says that 'Abdu-l Kádir translated soveral works from the Hindi. Now, we know that he translated, amongst other works, the Rámáyana and the Singhásan Battísí. It is much more probable that these were in the original Sanskrit, than in Hindí. 'Abdu-l Kádir and Firishta tell us that the Maká-bhárata was translated into Persian from the Hindi, the former 2 ascribing the work chiefly to Nakib Khan, the latter to Faizi.3 Here again there is every probability of the Sanskrit being meant. In another instance, 'Abdu-l Kádir tells us that he was called upon to translate the Atharva Veda from the Hindi, which he excused himself from doing, on account of the exceeding difficulty of the style and abstruseness of meaning, upon which the task devolved upon Hájí Ibráhím Sirhindí, who accomplished it satisfactorily. Here it is evident that nothing but Sanskrit could have been meant. But though the knowledge of Sanskrit appears to have been more generally diffused at this time, it was by no means the first occasion that Muhammadans had become acquainted with that language. Even if we allowed that they obtained the abridgment of the Pancha Tantra, under the name of Fables of Bidpai, or Hitopadeia,

² His account, which will be seen at p. 537, is very confused, and it is not easy to gather from it what share each of the coadjutors had in the translation. The same names are given in the Ain-i Albari; Sprenger's Bibl., pp. 59, 63.

⁴ In the Ashika and Null-sipake of Amir Khusri there are two important passages, showing that in the former Hindi means Sanskrit; and Amir Khusri in the same work says that he himself had a knowledge of the lag through the medium of the Pehleví, there are other facts which make it equally certain that the Muhammadans had attained a correct knowledge of the Sanskrit not long after the establishment of their religion; even admitting, as was probably the case, that most of the Arabic translations were made by Indian foreigners resident at Baghdád.

In the Khalifate of Al-Mamun, the Augustan age of Arabian literature, the treatise of Muhammad bin Musa on Algebra, which : was translated by Dr. Rosen in 1831, and the medical treatises of. Mikah and Ibn Dahan, who are represented to be Indians,3 show that Sanskrit must have been well known at that time; and even before that, the compilations of Charaka and Susruta had been translated, and had diffused a general knowledge of Indian medicine amongst the Arabs. From the very first, we find them paying particular attention to this branch of science, and encouraging the profession of it so much, that two Indians, Manka and Salih by name,—the former of whom translated a treatise on poison into Persian,—held appointments as body-physicians at the Court of Hárúnu-r Rashíd. The Arabians possessed during the early periods of the Khalifate several other Indian works which had been translated into Arabic, some on astronomy, some on music, some on judicial astrology, some on interpretation of dreams, some on the religion and theogony of the Hindús,10 some on their sacred scriptures, some on the calculation of nativities, some on agriculture, some on poisons, some on physiognomy, and some on palmistry, besides others, which need not be hero enumerated.

If we turn our eyes towards India, wo find that scarcely had these ruthless conquerors gained a footing in the land, than Biruni exerted himself with the utmost diligence to study the language, literature, and science of India, and attained, as we have already seen, such proficiency in it, as to be able to translate into, as well as from, the Sanskrit. Muhammad bin Isruil-al Tanukhi also travelled early into India, to learn the system of astronomy which was taught by the sages of that country. There seems, however, no good authority for Abu-1 Fazl's statement in the Ain-i Akbari, that Abu Ma'shar (Albumazar) visited Benares at an earlier period;—and the visit of Ibn-al Baithar to India, four centuries afterwards, rests solely on the authority of Leo Africanus.

Again, when Fíroz Sháh, after the capture of Nagarkot, in the middle of the fourteenth century, obtained possession of a valuable Sanskrit Library, he ordered a work on philosophy, divination, and omens to be translated, under the name of Daláil-i Fíroz-sháhí, by Mauláná 'Izzu-d dín Khálid Khání,—and to have enabled the translator to do this, he must have acquired no slight knowledge of the original, before his selection for the duty.

In the Nawwab Jalalu-d daula's Library at Lucknow, there is a work on astrology, also translated from the Sanskrit into Persian in Fíroz Shah's reign. A knowledge of Sanskrit must have prevailed pretty generally about this time, for there is in the Royal Library at Lucknow a work on the veterinary art, which was translated from the Sanskrit by order of Ghiyasu-d din Muhammad Shah Khilji. This rare book, called Kurrutu-l Mulk, was translated as early as A.H. 783 (A.D. 1381), from an original, styled Salotar, which is the name of an Indian, who is said to have been a Brahman, and the tutor of Susruta. The Preface says that the translation was made "from the barbarous Hindi into the refined Persian, in order that there may be no more need of a reference to infidels." It is a small work, comprising only 41 pages 8vo. of 13 lines, and the style is very concise. It is divided into eleven chapters and thirty sections. The precise age of this work is doubtful, because, although it is plainly stated to have been translated in A.H. 783, yet the reigning prince is called Sultán Ghiyásu-d dín Muhammad Sháh, son of Mahmud Shah, and there is no king so named whose reign exactly corresponds with that date. The nearest is Ghiyásu-d dín 'Azím Sháh bin Sikandar Sháh, who reigned in Bengal from A.H. 769 to 775.1 If Sultán Ghiyásu-d dín Tughlik be meant, it should date sixty years earlier, and if the King of Malwa who bore that name be meant, it should be dated 100 years later; any way, it very much precedes the reign of Akbar.2 The translator makes no mention in it of the work on the same subject, which had been previously translated from the Sanskrit into Arabic at Baghdád, under the name of Kitábu-l Baitarat.

From all these instances it is evident that Faizi did not occupy the entirely new field of literature for which he usually obtains credit.³ The same error seems to have prevaded the history of European scholarship in Sanskrit. We read as early as A.D. 1677, of Mr. Marshall's being a proficient in the language, and without mentioning the dubious names of Anquetil du Perron and Father Paolino, others could be named, who preceded in this arduous path the celebrated scholars of the present period. Thus, Holwell says that he read and understood Sanskrit, and P. Pons, the Jesuit (1740), knew the language. In such an inquiry as this also must not be omitted the still more important evidence afforded by the Mujmalu-t Tawarikh, from which Extracts have been given in Vol. I. p. 100.

² It is curious, that without any allusion to this work, another on the veterinary art, styled Salotari, and said to comprise in the Sanskrit original 16,000 alokas, was translated in the reign of Sháh Jahán, "when there were many learned men who knew Sanskrit," by Saivid 'Abdu-lla Khán Bahádur Fíroz Jang, who had found it amongst some other Sanskrit books, which during his expedition against Mewar, in the reign of Jahángír, had been plundered from Amar Singh, Ráná of Chitor, and "one of the chief zamindars of the hill-country." It is divided into twelve chapters, and is more than double the size of the other.
